Winnipeg electronic artist wins Governor General's Award

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Pioneering electronic artist Reva Stone is in Ottawa this week to kick off a four-month exhibit of her work at the National Gallery and to collect the 2015 Governor General's Award in visual and media arts.

The award, which recognizes outstanding career achievement, was to be presented April 8 by Gov. Gen. David Johnston at Rideau Hall. It comes with a $25,000 cash prize and a medallion produced by the Canadian Mint (in addition to the exhibit).

"I am thrilled and honoured," the Jewish Winnipegger said about the award. "It's not something I ever expected. I am going to enjoy every minute of it."

She noted that, at a youthful-looking 70, she is among the oldest recipients of the award.

The former Reva Atnikov was born in Winnipeg and raised in Regina. She returned to Winnipeg for university, earned a BA and married a young dentist named Harold Stone.

After being a stay-at-home mom raising her two children, Stone went back to university in 1985 to pursue her passion for art. While she began her artistic career with traditional oils and brushes, she was soon drawn to creating art through electronic and digital means. Over a seven-year period, she transitioned to producing videos and, later, interactive art that explores humanity's relationship to technology.

"I had to learn everything from scratch," she said. "There were no resources available to learn from."

She began using computers in 1990.

"In my work, I try to portray the evolution of technology and how technology changes how we live," she explains.

Her Carnevale 3.0, for example, is a life-size aluminum figure – meant to represent the artist at nine years old – on a robotic platform that uses heat sensors to photograph visitors to the art gallery.

Reva Stone

Portal combines software, robotics and cell phone technology to create a work that seems almost human.

Stone was nominated for the award by a board member of the independent support group Mentoring Artists for Women's Art, a group she's been associated with for a long time.

Her works have been exhibited and are in collections across Canada, as well the United States and Europe. One of her pieces is owned by Seneca College in Toronto, and her most recent exhibition in Toronto was last year at New Adventures in Sound Art.

In August, she's slated to take part in a show in Vancouver as part of the 2015 International Symposium on Electronic Art. ■

Congratulations!

In honour of your marriage, The Canadian Jewish News is pleased to present you with a 6 month subscription.

Josef Zissels: 'Ukrainian Jews are part of the country's political nation'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

The Kyiv-based vice-president of the World Jewish Congress and chair of the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress, Josef Zissels, visited Ottawa March 3 and Toronto March 4 to share his perspectives on Ukrainian-Jewish relations in Ukraine and trends in the overall political climate.

The CJN spoke with him about Ukrainian Jews' involvement in the Maidan protest movement in Kyiv in 2013, when then-president Viktor Yanukovych was overthrown; anti-Semitism; and the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter, a multinational group that promotes stronger ties between Ukrainians of Jewish, Christian and other heritages in Ukraine, Israel and the Diaspora.

Were Ukrainian Jews generally opposed to Yanukovych before his overthrow?

We didn't do any surveys on this, but I feel the majority of Jews in Ukraine are normal, adequate people, so they couldn't like what Yanukovych was doing… Some made money under Yanukovych, so they supported him. But we also saw businessmen who were against Yanukovych… If you asked Jews, 'Are you for or against Yanukovych?' it would be difficult to answer. But if you asked if they are for democracy, you would find they are reasonable people [who want democracy] and dignity.

They see how Jews live in Europe and how they live in Russia, and of course, they choose [to be closer to Europe], even though there is much more anti-Semitism there than in Ukraine and Russia combined.

To what extent were Ukrainian Jews involved in the Maidan movement?

Every ethnic group living in Ukraine, including ethnic Ukrainians, can be divided into three categories:

1. People who belong to an authoritarian, Soviet past and actively defend it and don't desire to live in a European Ukraine (they are anti-Maidan).

2. People who are indifferent – it doesn't matter when and how to live. They have no obvious preference.

3. People who are sincerely trying to break away from their authoritarian, Soviet past and to live in a democratic, prosperous and decent Ukraine (the pro-Maidan).

Among Jews, there are, to this day, Soviet Jews, the Jews of Ukraine and Ukrainian Jews. For the past 23 years, we have seen a process of transformation take place – the transformation of [some] from Soviet Jews to Jews of Ukraine to Ukrainian Jews. The latter were the ones on the Maidan: they spoke, helped and defended the Maidan (three died there and are among the "Heavenly Hundred" – Euromaidan protestors who were killed in the clashes).

Now Ukrainian Jews are among the volunteers in civil society's main activities. They help displaced persons; help the army and National Guard with money, medication, weapons; they fight as part of the armed forces.

We don't have statistics, but from general considerations, it's clear that Jews are very active in various areas. That's why they were disproportionately more present on Maidan and in parliament, business, science and civil society.

Ukrainian Jews are part of the Ukrainian political nation, just like French Jews for nearly 200 years have been an integral part of the French political nation.

How common was anti-Semitism under Yanukovych's rule and now, under President Petro Poroshenko?

During Yanukovych's rule, the problem was not anti-Semitism, but total theft from the people and a government with no end to its corruption, the lowering of human dignity, a disregard of the nation's interests. This brought out protest [among people], not anti-Semitism. In the last years of Yanukovych's [rule], and now, there is very little anti-Semitism in Ukraine.

How does Poroshenko treat Ukraine's Jews?

We don't want the Ukrainian authorities, including the president, to especially single out our community from other ethnic minorities in Ukraine. Of course, there are our particular issues related to memory of the Holocaust, migration and others, but we see that the president relates positively to our community. He spoke at the annual commemoration of the Babi Yar tragedy, assured us there is no place for anti-Semitism in Ukraine, and attended the recent anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Where did the notion that the new Ukrainian government is anti-Semitic or fascistic originate?

This began under former Ukrainian president Leonid Kuchma, when the label of "fascist" was first used to identify the opposition. And the Yanukovych government last year did all it could to show that the opposition was fascist and nationalist. We understood these elaborations came from Russia.

Ukraine had an interim government before the election that brought Poroshenko to power. That government had in it several members of the Svoboda party, which is radical, but was also in opposition to Yanukovych (although many believe the party was financed by Yanukovych, so when faced with the next presidential race, Ukrainians would pick him over Svoboda's leader). Because the label of opposition equals fascist was already there, it was easier for Yanukovych, his followers and Putin to call the opposition fascist. Labels stick… although time is showing that the Ukrainian leadership is neither fascist nor anti-Semitic.

Josef Zissels

Has it been your sense that Ukrainian Jews or Jews outside Ukraine believed it was fascist or anti-Semitic?

After the government changed, almost all the Jewish organizations in Ukraine supported the new government. In Ukraine, few believed this, but for Jews outside the country, they did more, because a stereotype exists.

What sort of work does the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter do?

UJE has sponsored many activities, including developing a shared historical narrative that engages scholars and experts to produce a truthful account of the Ukrainian-Jewish relationship over the centuries. Before last year's presidential election, it was one of the sponsors of a major conference in Kyiv called "Ukraine: Thinking Together," which brought together leading intellectuals to discuss the situation in Ukraine as a way of supporting the democratization process taking place there.

UJE is a sponsor of the Metropolitan Andrey Sheptysky Award, an honour bestowed annually on an individual in Ukraine, Israel or the Diaspora who has made an important contribution to Ukrainian-Jewish understanding and cooperation.

At this year's book fair in Jerusalem, UJE presented a new, Yiddish-Ukrainian dictionary and sponsored a famous Ukrainian writer, Irena Karpa, who talked about cultural and literary movements in the country today.

My organization works closely with UJE. It has sponsored a number of our initiatives, including youth camps that advocate tolerance. My trip to Canada and the United States, where I met with Ukrainian and Jewish communities, their leaders and leaders of various ethnic Diaspora groups, was made possible through the support of UJE.

What non-Jewish groups, if any, are friends or allies of the Jews in Ukraine?

We co-operate with many organizations in civil society, and almost all of them are our compatriots. We see very positive attitudes from them toward Jews. Among the Kyiv Patriarchate [of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church], the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, Protestants, there is great sympathy toward Jews, and co-operation, for example, with the Ukrainian Catholic University, which also works with UJE, and various human rights group.

The Russian government is considered quite friendly to Jews. Would you say that's true? And has that changed at all, in light of the recent conflict?

I think the Russian government is friendly only to itself, and has used the Jewish question to its benefit. It wants to show the world that in Russia, there is a civilized approach to others. But if it becomes beneficial to its interests, if it suits its purpose, the government will make Jews an internal enemy. We've seen this done in history before.

Approximately how many Jews live in Ukraine?

Around 300,000. They typically live in large cities, with the majority living in the centre, southern and eastern regions of the country.

What is their typical socio-economic status?

They are middle class and work in all industries.

What's their typical religious affiliation?

They're mostly secular, but there are religious Jews. There are 70 synagogues working in Ukraine today. ■

Einstein's Jewish and Zionist awakening

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE

Albert Einstein's parents were assimilated German Jews who considered themselves "Israelites," which was typical of westernized Jews in Germany in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Einstein, who was born in 1879, did not have a bar mitzvah, though as a young man he did show a keen interest in religion and for a time adhered to Jewish dietary rules.

After spending more than two decades studying and working in Switzerland, where he developed his theory of general relativity, he returned to Berlin in 1914. He accepted a position as the director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute for Physics, where he would remain until he was forced to flee to the United States in 1933 following the Nazi's rise to power.

In Switzerland, as he later admitted in a 1921 interview, he was ambivalent about his Jewish heritage. "There was nothing in my life that would have stirred my Jewish feeling or stimulated it," he said. Yet in Berlin during and after World War I, he was confronted with anti-Semitism. It was then that Einstein began to reflect more seriously on his Jewish identity and write about it.

Tracking his Jewish and Zionist awakening online is now possible, owing to the recent digitization (and translation from German to English) of thousands of his letters and papers – a joint effort between the Hebrew University, which Einstein helped found in 1918 and where the Albert Einstein Archives are located; Princeton University, where he taught after he came to the United States; and the California Institute of Technology.

In a newspaper article published at the end of 1919, Einstein denounced the widely held right-wing propaganda that Germany's approximately 30,000 east European Jews were "black marketers, Bolsheviks [and] elements that are averse to work." The agitation against these Jews that called for their expulsion, he asserted, "raises the suspicion that calm judgment is being dimmed by strong anti-Semitic instincts."

In another unpublished article he penned in the spring of 1920, he was more critical of German Jews like his parents, those who perceived themselves to be "German citizens" of the "Mosaic faith." To Einstein there was "something comical, even tragicomical in this designation." In a world in which "race" and nationalism were powerful concepts, he believed strongly that there was a "Jewish nationality" that defined Jews, no matter what their socio-economic status. And pretending otherwise was "useless and morally questionable," in his view. Moreover, at the time it was a no-win situation since, as he put it, "anti-Semites have no intention of clearly distinguishing between eastern European and western European Jews as some western European Jews might wish."

Einstein was initially indifferent to Zionism and at one point scorned Zionists as a "small band of impractical people that strike one as medieval." Yet like Theodor Herzl, who wrote in 1895 that "only anti-Semitism" had made him a Jew, Einstein, too, was drawn to the movement as a backlash against anti-Semitism and as a necessity for Jewish survival.

"I am not a Jew in the sense that I would demand the preservation of the Jewish or any other nationality as an end in itself," he explained in 1921. "I rather see Jewish nationality as a fact, and I believe every Jew must draw the consequences from this fact. I consider raising Jewish self-confidence necessary, also in the interest of a normal living together with non-Jews. This is the major motive of my joining the Zionist movement…The founding of a free Jewish community structure in Palestine will again put Jewish people in a position where they can unencumbered fully uphold their creative capabilities."

By then, he had concluded that European Jews needed access to higher education, and if that was not possible in Europe, then a university in Jerusalem was a necessity. And more significantly, that fostering Jewish pride was essential. "We Jews need a revival of the feeling of community in order to preserve or rather regain a dignified existence," he wrote to a friend in November 1929. "I see in Zionism the only effort which leads us closer to this goal."■

Mad Men's day of mourning, and keep that chametz out of the park

Draper breaks down during shivah visit

Jewish fans of Mad Men saw something familiar in the final season's premiere: a full-on shivah, with anti-hero Don Draper in attendance no less. Draper shows up at the shivah for his dead ex-lover Rachel Menken and is met by her sister Barbara, who knows Draper ultimately rejected Rachel to save his unhappy marriage. When Barbara starts explaining what "sitting shivah" means, he says he's lived in New York for a long time and knows what it is (he even brought cake). But his non-Jewishness becomes an issue when he's asked to help form a minyan. "He can't. He's not Jewish," Barbara says with disdain. As he leaves, he starts crying as he hears prayers in Hebrew in the next room.

Apparently he doesn't count in a minyan.

FIFA president rejects Israel ban

The president of FIFA, soccer's global governing body, expressed opposition to a Palestinian request to ban Israel from international competition. Sepp Blatter told AFP April 7 that "such a situation shall not occur at the FIFA Congress because suspension of a federation for any reason is always something which harms the whole organization." Blatter, who met later in the day with Palestinian Football Association chief Jibril Rajoub in Cairo, didn't comment further. The Palestinian soccer group said it will ask for Israel's suspension from FIFA competition at next month's FIFA Congress in Zurich, for "racist behaviour against Arabs." It has called for a ban on Israel several times, most recently last fall after Israeli forces raided the association's Ramallah offices. Blatter threatened to suspend Israel in 2013 for West Bank travel restrictions the Palestinians say inhibits their athletes.

Cracking down on bread

Visitors to a public park in Afula, Israel, were turned away last week by a security guard checking bags at the entrance for weapons and chametz. Several scofflaws ate their sandwiches outside before entering the grounds. Israeli law bans the display and sale of chametz on Passover. It's also banned from hospitals and other public institutions. One Tel Aviv lawyer told Ha'aretz that he was considering suing the municipality on behalf of those turned away. ■

After the elections

Collective support of Israel, peace and of human rights has long been the hallmark of Canada's Jewish community, demonstrating our incredible strength and unity. Organizations that attempt to drive a wedge between the Jewish People and Israel are harmful to this unity. It is a cause for celebration that Israelis, on the front lines facing threats to their safety and security every day, uphold a strong and free democracy enjoyed by everyone.

Yet it is easy to condescend, to condemn your own, to criticize and to express disappointment from the comfort and safety of Canada. It is more difficult to try to steer the Jewish People through a sea of hatred while struggling to find a realistic way to build a lasting peace.

Of the many different conversations we should have had at our seder tables, perhaps the most important now is confronting anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism and the virulent delegitimization of Israel. Weakness, disunity and the politics of defeatism can only diminish us and undermine our own human rights. We must continue standing shoulder to shoulder as a strong, proud and free people.

Avi Benlolo, President & CEO, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies
Toronto

Pluralism is a virtue

As a rebbetzin for 22 years, I have come across many people within the Jewish communities where I have lived and worked who try to pigeonhole Judaism and try to clarify that their way is the correct way or the only way.

The miracle at Mount Sinai was witnessed by the entire population with a clarity and understanding. "I am what I will be," God said to everyone.

I find the miracle was not only the dramatic scene, but the realization at that moment by everyone of what was being said. "I am what I will be to you, the one who speaks to you, moves you and guides you to get there with love. I will give you guidance for the job that needs to be done for the world to work according to my word. Here is the outline and the guide. Use it to be my people among all other people."

The true miracle of Mount Sinai was thousands of people understanding exactly what was being said and all agreeing!

Today we have rabbis who teach the credos of the moment at Mount Sinai. Some rabbis work through social action, others work through knowledge and others form policy and governance.

Each of us individually hears what speaks to us through our rabbis. What works for me religiously might not work for another, but am I wrong for hearing or moving in a different way from my neighbour to obtain the same goal?

If a teacher/rabbi has the legitimacy and credentials necessary to teach, and people have the ability to hear, observe and grow spiritually, morally and humanistically, then for what purpose is it to say it doesn't work or is questionable?

I am extremely glad there is the Canadian Haggadah Canadienne designed for all Jews. I am disappointed that Rabbi Mordechai Bulua would criticize a work written by an educated rabbi ("Not truly Orthodox," April 2). For everyone to hear the words of the Almighty, we have to speak the language of the people, otherwise it is not really communication, and "I am what I will be" turns into "I am what your rabbis want me to be."

Elizabeth Bright
Cote St. Luc, Quebec

No to a two-state solution

With the re-election of Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister of Israel, it is suggested that there is now a significant different point of view between Canada and Israel with regard to a Palestinian state.

Netanyahu has indicated that during his term in office there will not be a Palestinian state. The Harper government is publicly committed to a two-state solution as the best outcome.

I believe that Prime Minister Stephen Harper is astute enough to realize that there cannot be a Palestinian state while the Palestinian Authority refuses to recognize Israel as a Jewish state and while Hamas is still committed to the destruction of the State of Israel.

A so-called Palestinian state would have to include Gaza and land controlled by the Palestinian Authority. Until both the Palestinian Authority and Hamas agree to Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state, there can never be a two-state solution.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

"They thought of everything."

How will we memorialize the Shoah?

Education should become more focused on actionable change, and the Holocaust can be incorporated into rituals with meaningful theologies attached to them

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: As we observe Yom Hashoah, this year marking 70 years since the end of the darkest period of our history, we are painfully aware of the effect of the passing of time on the number of Holocaust survivors still among us.

We have been strengthened by the presence of those who have shared their testimonies of the horrors they experienced, as well as their memories of the richness and vibrancy of their communities that were destroyed. We have been inspired by their courage and tenacity. So many who survived have been instrumental in building our community institutions, and establishing and strengthening the State of Israel.

How will future generations face a time, when, sadly, there will be no more survivors to offer living testimony to the Shoah? Will they be ready to face a survivor-less future?

Rabbi Finegold: There seems to be a gap between the message sent by the Jewish community and the message received by the future leaders of the community. I am not as concerned about the fact that there will be no more survivors in the near future – that is the nature of history. We have no survivors of the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, yet we have a robust system in place for remembering that tragedy.

The current model of Holocaust education is not working. I often hear people express that the last thing they want to hear is another Shoah testimony or a scholar pontificating on what happened. The message being expressed is "Yes, yes six million. It's terribly sad. But I'm here in Montreal and we have clearly learned as a society to police these kinds of things and prevent them from happening again."

This is an oversimplification, of course, especially considering the many genocides perpetrated in recent history, but it is not far from the truth. Very little of the current Holocaust education is focused on actionable changes. I think we need to start rethinking our model to change the response from "So what?" to "Now what?"

Rabbi Scheim: We continue to remember the Egyptian enslavement and Exodus and the destructions of the Holy Temples, because they were ritualized. Pesach and Tisha b'Av, along with regular liturgical and ritual reminders throughout the year, remind us of these early transformative events.

Similarly, in an attempt to ritualize the Holocaust, my synagogue was instrumental in creating Megillat Hashoah, which we read on Erev Yom HaShoah. Our annual program focuses on the reading of the text, some of which is chanted in the traditional Eicha trope, in the Tisha b'Av mode. There are no speeches.

Alex Eisen, my congregant, envisioned this project and raised significant funds to enable its production and translation into several languages. As a survivor, he understood the need to establish a vehicle to bring these essential memories into tomorrow's world.

Others have suggested fasting on Yom Hashoah as a means of ritualizing our Holocaust memories. And just as restaurants and entertainment venues in Israel are shut down on Yom Hashoah, a similar respect for the sanctity of the day would be appropriate in Diaspora communities as well.

I do agree with you. Our remembering has to lead to activism, to adding our voices, our energies and our resources into leading the world to a better place.

Rabbi Finegold: I am moved by your congregation's decision to ritualize this day and create powerful reminders that go beyond the typical synagogue response to Yom Hashoah. This is important for the future of Yom Hashoah, especially since many people deliberately choose not to observe it, claiming that Tisha b'Av serves as the umbrella for all tragic events in the Jewish calendar.

The key to making Yom Hashoah into a day of transformation is to change the tagline for the day – and indeed for any thinking related to the Shoah – away from "Never Again." The Egyptian slavery should never happen again. The destruction of a holy site and exile of a people should never happen again, either. Yet both events have more meaningful theologies attached to them. Perhaps this could be something you might begin to incorporate into your annual ritual – a message that creates positive work out of the senselessness of the Shoah. ■

Israel's achievements are a source of pride

DJ SCHNEEWEISS

The story of modern Israel has long been a central component of Jewish identity, part of the bedrock of Jewish life and collective Jewish purpose in the modern era. Nowhere is this truer than in Canada.

Israel owes a profound debt to the Canadian Jewish community. Without your engagement and support, and that of so many others around the world, Israel would not be what it is today.

But this relationship is by no means a one-way street. Israel also makes a huge contribution to the well-being of Jewish communities everywhere. Indeed, Jewish life could not and would not have flourished the way it has around the world since World War II without the existence and the enormous success of our tiny state.

On April 23, Israelis and Jews the world over will celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

There is so much to celebrate, even as we acknowledge that there is still much to do to ensure that Israel lives up to our highest ideals and aspirations. Together, the Jewish People have fashioned in Israel a pulsating Jewish democracy – a powerhouse of creativity and innovation that benefits mankind as a whole; a model society, not because it is perfect, but because its members and supporters are constantly striving to improve it.

Israel's qualities and achievements are rightly a source of great pride and inspiration to Jewish people everywhere. Reflecting this, a new initiative spearheaded by the Jewish Agency for Israel in partnership with UJA Federation and the Israeli Consulate hopes to energize the local Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations even further, by adding a new array of accessible, inclusive grassroots events that will open the door to contemporary Israel and its relevance to all Jews, irrespective of their age or religious or political affiliation.

The day before Yom Ha'atzmaut is Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Remembrance Day, on which Israel's citizens unite to mourn the more than 23,000 men and women who have paid with their lives for our sovereignty and security. We come together to grieve, to reaffirm our commitment to each other and our country despite all our differences, and to lend support to the families of the fallen and the victims.

Here in Toronto, as happens around the world, the consulate marks this central day together with the local community by holding an official memorial ceremony that directly parallels the ceremonies taking place in Israel. (This year's ceremony will take place at Beth Tzedec Congregation on Tuesday, April 21, at 7:30 pm.)

Here, as in Israel, we come together to acknowledge the debt we all owe.

The State of Israel has always been, and remains today, a remarkable achievement and a source of pride and unity for Jewish people everywhere.

I encourage everyone to join this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations and help make them more abundant, inclusive and comprehensive than ever before, and to come together as one on April 21, as we remember the terrible sacrifice that has been paid so that we can all thrive and we can indeed be a free people in our land. ■

Celebrating an individual bat mitzvah

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold

After Joelle finished leading Kabbalat Shabbat and delivering a thoughtful dvar Torah from the bimah as a bat mitzvah, her mother, Samantha Mintz Vineberg, spoke, recalling her own bat mitzvah.

"The gift of my own personal bat mitzvah that my parents gave me sent me a strong, clear and direct message… that as a woman, I was an important and valued member of the Jewish community."

She explained that as her own daughter had approached bat mitzvah age, she had no doubts in her mind that Joelle would not celebrate in a group setting, but on her own bat mitzvah day. "I felt that it would be important for Joelle to be recognized in her own right and have a formal service celebrating her reaching the age where she would be responsible for her own mitzvot [commandments], the same way we do for sons," she said.

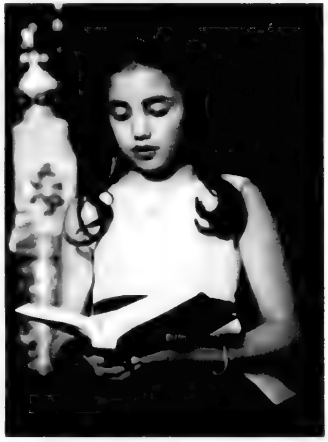
I first encountered the concept of a group bat mitzvah when I moved to Montreal from the United States two years ago. I had never seen one before, and I could not understand the idea. How can a girl celebrate her personal coming of age with others whose birthdays are months before or after her own? How significant a Jewish component could she perform when there were 10 other girls celebrating alongside her? And what could be the Jewish ritual context on a random Wednesday night? My curiosity soon turned to frustration and disbelief: if this milestone, which is meant to represent an individual girl's entry into the responsibilities of Judaism, is celebrated en masse, then we are sending our girls the wrong message. Besides, would you ever imagine a group bar mitzvah for boys?

It is worth recalling what lies at the core of bar and bat mitzvah. Technically speaking, girls and boys become bat and bar mitzvah on their 12th and 13th birthdays respectively. Having arrived at the age when they are responsible for keeping the mitzvot of the Torah, they are treated as full Jewish adults according to Jewish law.

Over the generations, it became customary for a boy to mark his entry into the age of mitzvot by performing a public Jewish ritual that he could not have performed as a Jewish minor. This usually has been an aliyah to the Torah, whereby the boy recites the blessings over the Torah scroll, recognizing his new state of commandedness to perform mitzvot.

For a young man to mark a bar mitzvah, he will perform a Jewish ritual as a full member of the adult community. There's no reason a bat mitzvah shouldn't be marked in the same way. In our synagogue, which strictly follows Orthodox Halachah, men and women have different obligations in mitzvot, and therefore different ritual roles. But this still leaves plenty of room for a bat mitzvah girl to powerfully step into Jewish adulthood by performing a public ritual within halachically acceptable boundaries.

A girl might lead Kabbalat Shabbat on Friday night, which consists of psalms and Lecha Dodi, all of which may halachically be led by a woman. Or, she might lead a women's tfillah on Thursday morning with her female friends and relatives, leading the prayers and chanting from the Torah scroll. We recently had a girl chant Megillat Esther on Purim morning to mark her bat mitzvah. Each of these rituals is accompanied by a dvar Torah, where the girl shares her understanding of Torah, which she has studied in preparation for the day. She thus celebrates her entry into the adult Jewish community in a ritually significant way.



Joelle at her bat mitzvah

This is not about being feminist, or about treating the girls like the boys. This is about sending a clear message to our daughters and granddaughters that they matter as individuals. I recently attended a bat mitzvah in a very religious Orthodox community, where girls do not participate ritually in the ways described above. However, this bat mitzvah was exactly what I hoped for. As the girl and her friends braided challah, she recited the blessing over the mitzvah of challah for the first time as a Jewish adult. As she uttered the words, one could feel the excitement of her being able to recite this brachah as a full participant in Jewish life.

There are good reasons for a group bat mitzvah. It provides the girls with a peer experience and a community with whom they celebrate their important year. However, a girl celebrating an individual bat mitzvah can still take part in group programming.

For several years, I taught a mother-daughter bat mitzvah class, a program created by MaTaN in Israel, in which pairs of moms and daughters shared in a weekly study experience. Most of the girls later used what they learned in speaking at their individual bat mitzvah celebrations. At the Shaar, we also offer a group experience for both our bar and bat mitzvah students, to foster that sense of community and commitment. However, each child also celebrates the religious milestone on his or her own day.

Many have argued that a group bat mitzvah option is especially important for the families who would not otherwise mark bat mitzvah. The fear is that if we eliminate the group option, many girls will have no bat mitzvah at all. I disagree. Without a group, families will find their own ways to celebrate this milestone, and over time, this will develop a spectrum of options for girls to choose from, to find their own voice and discover what this personal milestone means to each of them.

If we don't celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs as individual Jews, then how can we expect our children to choose to live Jewishly as they grow into adulthood? At the very least, we owe them their own Jewish identity. ■

BRINGING THE LIGHT OF TORAH AND WARMTH OF MITZVOT TO JEWS EVERYWHERE

GUEST VOICE

Genocides still happen, and I'm sick of indifference

Shireen Afzal

I was in third grade when I discovered the Holocaust. Looking back, I can't recall the title or author of the book I stumbled upon in the library, but I do remember that my hands wouldn't stop trembling after I finished reading it. The disgust, horror and anger that rose within me then have yet to leave.

I have long since stopped pretending that stories are just stories. They echo the truth, they express the innermost emotions of humanity, and they contain answers to questions people never bothered to ask. Maybe that's why I read so much: fiction or non-fiction, fantasy or memoir – somewhere there has to be an explanation for humanity's behaviour and there has to be a way to halt our crimes.

Why do the horrors never cease? I come from a country where bombs exploding in marketplaces and men slaughtering hundreds of school children have become yesterday's news.

Why does racism still exist? Even in Canada, I can't truly escape the critical eyes of society as they study my brown skin, my hijab and my immigrant parents and then deem me unworthy.

How much has the world really changed since the Holocaust? Genocides still happen, and people still watch while others die. Some call it human nature.

I call it ignorance.

Most people simply don't know, or if they know, they don't want to understand, or if they understand, they shove the problem away to a corner of their mind and forget. But I'm a 16-year-old girl who doesn't know what major to choose in college, let alone how to change the world. What can I do to change their minds?

I can write.

If Facing History has taught me anything, it's that you can't just label an event as a tragedy and walk away. You have to confront it, strip away the complex layers of motives and causes in the hopes that you will become closer to understanding what lies at the core of humanity. I'm sick of indifference and whether it's through social media, newspaper articles, novels, or survivor stories, I don't intend to let the world turn away anymore. I want to be like Deborah Ellis when she interviewed Israeli and Palestinian children in her book Three Wishes in an effort to convey that their diverse wishes all stemmed from the simple, human desire for happiness. I want to use stories to force people to notice, to break down their walls of prejudices, to dissolve their hatred, to build bridges between communities so that maybe someone will realize, "We're not so different after all."

Shireen Afzal

Lawyer and Nazi war crimes investigator Benjamin Ferencz knew that "creating a world of tolerance and compassion would be a long and arduous task," but he fought for justice because he believed that it could be achieved. Even if my dream isn't attained in my lifetime, it's worth it if I can work toward developing awareness and compassion in humanity, one word at a time. ■

Shireen Afzal is a Grade 11 student at Woburn Collegiate Institute, Toronto. This essay was the winner of the Upstander Scholarship Contest, a pilot project organized by Facing History and Ourselves, an international educational and professional development organization whose mission is to engage students of diverse backgrounds in an examination of racism, prejudice, and anti-Semitism in order to promote the development of a more humane and informed citizenry.

Canadians to testify at trial of Nazi guard

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Hedy Bohm's first reaction to being asked to testify in a German courtroom against a former guard at the Auschwitz death camp was "a definite no. I didn't want to go."

But the more the 86-year-old survivor of Auschwitz thought about it, the more she realized she was destined to deliver justice in the case.

Bohm, who lives in Toronto, will be one of seven Canadian Auschwitz survivors who will travel to the northern German city of Lüneburg later this month and next to testify against Oskar Groening, a former SS sergeant charged with 300,000 counts of aiding and abetting murder.

That figure corresponds to the number of Hungarian Jews who were sent to the gas chambers immediately on arriving in Auschwitz in the spring of 1944.

The survivors are "co-plaintiffs" in the case – those whose parents, siblings or children were murdered at the camp. They will recount their experiences and what their losses meant in their lives.

There is no Canadian equivalent to their status under German law. Their testimony will come close to the victim impact statement that's often delivered in criminal cases in this country.

The co-plaintiffs "are a kind of co-prosecution," explained Rafael Wugalter, a Montreal lawyer and translator who is assisting in the case.

They will not be cross-examined by Groening's lawyers.

Bohm arrived in Auschwitz in early June 1944 with her parents, who were shunted to their executions "within moments." She told The CJN that when she was asked to testify, "I couldn't imagine why I would want to put myself through this. And then later on, I stopped to think about it and what it meant."

She was swayed, she said, by the entreaties of Thomas Walther, a retired German judge turned Nazi hunter who is representing about 50 co-plaintiffs worldwide and was in Canada a few weeks ago to videotape survivors' memories.

Shirley Burnstein, camp mother and personal inspiration

Pamela Medjuck Stein

"As long as we all pull together,
Kadimah will grow more and more
Our camp will be bigger and better, than ever it has been before."

Shirley Burnstein wrote these words, the Camp Kadimah song, with her cousin, Ralph Garson, in 1944 or '45. Burnstein's words will grab the attention of everyone who has attended Camp Kadimah since 1943, and so they should. Virtually every Maritime Jewish youngster has sung them since. In fact, the chorus now rings with voices across Canada, the United States and Israel.

The words evoke the joy of singing full out with your friends in the beautiful bubble of a Lake William summer. They call up the spirit of Maritime exceptionality, a community on fire with enthusiasm and unblemished confidence in a better future. As I sing them to myself, I realize they also encapsulate Shirley Burnstein.

Legends rise from the shores of Atlantic Canada. Some are even true, even as memories blur the awkwardness of small town Jewish living with the annual freedom of being all Jewish kids together at camp. We straggled in from Saint John's, Halifax and Woodstock in our individual town personae – the kids from the Wharf in Sydney had a culture, as did the gang from Fredericton. Yet, every summer, we achieved so much together. We had limited resources but even fewer roadblocks.

People often ask me, "Where do you Maritimers get your spirit? Why do you all love each other so much?" I credit Shirley Burnstein with teaching Maritime Jewish children to know and love what collective achievement and community happiness look like. It's probably why we began to love each other way back when.

At Camp Kadimah in the 1960s and '70s Shirley would take 40 or so campers (whoever came to the audition) ages eight to 18, and she would mount musical theatre extravaganzas in a barn-like hall, the rec hall (the ulam). She produced and directed HMCS Pinafore, Fiddler on the Roof, The Sound of Music, Oliver and more. It was hard work for everyone, with many hours of rehearsal time, building sets from two-by-fours and rolls of paper, and a lot of quietly waiting your turn. But the result felt so shockingly professional that even the cast was astounded. And this was the secret win.

Shirley would draw resilience, commitment and exuberant performance out of kids who didn't know if they could sing or dance, but "kinda" wanted to try. She was an artist herself, an opera singer by professional training. She respected the creative artist within each of her "protégés," and this respect instilled in each member of her cast and crew a sense of personal specialness and mission. Each shone like a star. She would also remind the audience that it was their special privilege to be there watching. It worked so well – as long as we all pulled together.

These long-ago productions contributed content to the pride that Kadimah alumni still exude. As they say, nothing builds commitment like success. The Kadimah musicals fostered a sense of camp-wide accomplishment every summer that Shirley led her shows. Her passion for the creative spirit was so strong that, as soon as one curtain came down, she was already talking about the next summer. Her enthusiasm made cast members thrill at the prospect of doing it again.

She was camp mom and a model of perpetual renewable commitment. It was never over. Like the song, our camp will be bigger and better than ever it has been before.

Shirley B, who died in January, taught several generations of Maritimers to pitch in, collaborate and give it their all. Through Shirley, we learned the sheer joy of achievement. It is a tremendous legacy. May her memory be a blessing. ■

Pamela Medjuck Stein is from Halifax, N.S., and is a Camp Kadimah alumna. She sits on the board of directors of The Canadian Jewish News.

Why not amortize day school tuition?

Daniel Held

Last month, our washing machine broke. It was the original machine in the house, built in 1968. I thought the repairman was going to cry when he couldn't fix it. "They just don't build them like they used to," he lamented.

The next day we went off to shop for a new machine. In each store, the salesperson showed us a set of machines with different features, but then continued to tell us about their financing specials. In one store we could get zero per cent financing for 12 months, in another two per cent for two years, and so on. It reminded me of buying a car a year earlier, when the sales pitch was both about the quality of the car and about the terms of payment.

With most major purchases, we are given the opportunity to amortize the cost over time. A mortgage for a house, a loan for car, and financing for a washing machine allow us to enjoy the benefits of the purchase while spreading out the expense.

In education, the key example is university tuition. In the United States, where tuition is significantly higher than in Canada, parents start saving from early in a child's life. Then, through college and for years afterward, parents and children continue paying off student loans. Rather than paying for college for the four years of an undergraduate degree, families pay for it over the span of several decades. As in the United States, the Canadian government incentivizes such amortization by offering registered education savings plans for the years before university and government sponsored student loans for the years after.

Student loans afford students the ability to defer the costs of education until they have a higher income to pay for it. During university, after all, many students have little to no income. Later, however, graduates are (hopefully) reaping the benefits of their education and earning a salary that allows them to pay back the school debt.

In many ways, we face a similar challenge with day school tuition. When children enter day school – in nursery, kindergarten or Grade 1 – their parents are still at the beginning of a financial journey. They may have recently bought a new house, they may be in the early stages of their career, and they may even still be paying off student debt. It can be a challenging time financially, and the cost of day school tuition adds to the burden.

As we experiment with ways to make day schools more affordable and sustainable, one of many ideas percolating is the possibility of amortizing tuition over time.

For some, personal financial security comes later in life – when a mortgage is paid off, when we have climbed the career ladder and found more solid professional footing. What if tuition were payable over a longer period, allowing families more certainty in their cash flow and the ability to pay for tuition when their income is higher and expenses lower? While doing so would require bridge funding to allow schools to sustain themselves while waiting for families to pay their full bill, it could go a long way to alleviate the crunch of paying for day school at a time in life when finances are especially tight.

I have written before that tackling the challenges of day school financial sustainability and affordability will require creative thinking and a willingness to experiment. This spring, as hundreds of high school students attend the March of the Living, we are dipping our toe into the experiment of amortizing Jewish educational costs. In collaboration with Jewish Free Loan Toronto, a group of participants in the March received interest-free loans, allowing them to pay the participation fee over time. The program is an experiment from which we'll learn, but it represents a helpful step in the right direction. ■

Yom Hashoah

Jean M. Gerber

"In Eternal memory to the men, women and children of Yaltushkow who perished at the hands of the Nazis in the summer of 1942"

These words are inscribed over an archway leading to graves of the Yaltushkower Landsmanshaft Benevolent Society, located in a vast city of the dead in Queens, N.Y. This is where my father-in-law and mother-in-law are buried with others who came to the United States before war swept the rest away.

My husband's father met regularly with transplanted Yaltushkowers. As with so many other immigrants, he bonded most closely with those from his own part of Ukraine. His father and one sister had gone on to the golden land before World War I, which trapped the rest of the family in Europe until they could be reunited.

According to family lore, his mother wanted to stay in Ukraine, but battles among White Czarist troops, Reds and Cossacks thrown in for good measure, made life unbearable. Finally, mother and the rest of the children came to America in 1920.

As well they did. Jews who stayed "home," perhaps because no one was in America to support them, or they felt they could ride out the civil war, or who knows why, died in the 1942 massacre, their names lost. Their only memorial is the arch in the cemetery.

After the war, someone went back to the site of Yaltushkow to see if anyone had survived. None had. For the family, only one picture remains of a cousin with her husband and child, who stayed in the USSR and vanished with the rest in 1942.

My husband remembers hushed conversations in his kitchen after the war, the sound of weeping. Only later would he learn why the adults cried.

Remembrance ceremonies around Yom Hashoah remind us that those who stayed "home" were the ones who paid the greatest price. All we are left with are stories those who survived can tell us.

Every year a unique cadre of survivors who contain the history of those years of darkness is diminished by death. Soon, only accounts that have been preserved through oral histories, recorded interviews, books and personal memoirs, will be all that remain for coming generations. Each one is a precious and irreplaceable repository.

Recalling someone who has died, we say, "May their name be for a blessing."

So many Jews died with their entire families in the Holocaust that their names were lost completely. Where names of those murdered millions remain, we are brought closer to them. By reciting their names, we maintain a memory of those who were consumed.

A poem by Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai, The Synagogue in Florence, includes some of those names we ourselves saw inscribed on the memorial wall:

"Tender spring in the courtyards
A tree blossoming, four girls playing
Between two lessons of the sacred language
In front of a memorial wall
Made of marble: Levi, Sonino, Cassuto
And others
In straight lines, as in a newspaper
Or in the scrolls of the Torah

The tree stands there in memory of nothing
But of this spring
A rivederci, our father
Buona notte, our king"

Even more devastating than the synagogue in Florence, if there are comparable moments of pain, may be the Pinchas shul in Prague. Its entire interior is covered with the names of the dead, so that one is wrapped in their names as in a tallit.

In these places, one is far from the concentration camps. In a camp, one breathes anonymous death; in a name, we may picture someone's life.

The Vietnam war memorial in Washington, D.C., the memorial in New York for those killed in the destruction of Sept. 11 – by naming those who died in those conflagrations, we are closer to them. So it is with the memorials in Florence and Prague, and others like them: at least their names will not be forgotten, but be a blessing for us. ■

Is the Iran deal good or bad? Depends how you look at it

Paul Michaels

It's been just two weeks since a long-delayed preliminary or "framework" agreement was reached between six major world powers and Iran on its nuclear program. A final or "comprehensive" agreement is supposed to be concluded by June 30.

Already, there's been a flood of analyses, from both Israel and the West, about whether the framework plan is a "good" or "bad" deal.

Where one comes down on this depends on where one begins, what one believes has been achieved thus far, and what one expects in the next few months.

Regarding the first point – where one begins – it's important to recall something that's been almost entirely ignored: that, when talks for the first interim agreement were launched in November 2013, their declared aim was bold and definitive: "The goal of these negotiations is to reach a mutually agreed long-term comprehensive solution that would ensure Iran's nuclear program will be exclusively peaceful. Iran reaffirms that under no circumstances will Iran ever seek or develop any nuclear weapons" (emphasis added).

Yet, no sooner had the objective that Iran's nuclear program would be "exclusively peaceful" been announced than we began hearing the talks were really about making sure Iran could not "break out" to a nuclear weapon for at least one year. So much for "under no circumstances… ever."

The lofty goal of preventing Iran from ever having a nuclear bomb quickly became an exercise in creating conditions under which it would be unlikely Iran could cheat its way toward building a bomb in under a year – arguably time enough for the ruse to be detected and possibly countered.

Tehran, after all, has mastered deceiving the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency, its nuclear watchdog agency, about Iran's obligations under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty (NPT), which it had signed, committing it to disclosing all its nuclear activities and sites. Secret sites – Natanz, and Fordow – were revealed by other means, a discovery that led the UN Security Council to pass binding resolutions first forbidding Iran from carrying out any nuclear fuel enrichment, and, when Iran defied it, imposing sanctions for its defiance.

The 2013 interim agreement, which allowed Iran to enrich fuel up to five per cent, was a step back from the Security Council resolutions. According to many analysts, however, it amounted to a recognition that nothing short of war, and perhaps not even that, was going to stop Iran from asserting its "right" to enrich, even though such a "right" doesn't exist under the NPT. In any event – and this brings us to the second point – the current interim (or preliminary) plan prohibits Iran from enriching "over 3.67 per cent for at least 15 years."

Still, according to the White House account of the plan, Iran is permitted to run slightly more than 5,000 first-generation centrifuges for enrichment purposes at Natanz while, at Fordow, another 1,000 centrifuges will be allowed to operate but "not to enrich uranium" in a "research" facility that is to be used "for peaceful purposes only." Does this imply, however unwittingly, the possibility that other facilities may be used for anything other than "peaceful" purposes? Apparently not.

This brings us to the third point. The only means to ensure that Iran's nuclear program remains "peaceful" – that is, that Iran doesn't cheat – is to ensure that IAEA inspectors will be allowed unfettered access to any site at any time. The details regarding such "intrusive" inspection remain to be worked out in the coming months. So too, critically, does the time frame for, and the extent of, sanctions relief, which is Iran's primary goal and one Iran reportedly believes (erroneously according to U.S. officials) it will attain as soon as it signs the comprehensive agreement, assuming it does so.

Expect the following weeks and months leading to the June 30 deadline to be fraught with heated disagreements about exactly what the preliminary plan, leading to a comprehensive deal, entails. ■

Israeli non-profit helps lone soldiers feel less alone

JODIE SHUPAC

At the non-profit Ach Gadol's third anniversary celebration, the organization surprised a lone soldier from India by bringing his parents to Israel.

Being a lone soldier can make any problem – breaking up with a girlfriend, dealing with a difficult landlord, missing one's family – feel amplified, says Jonathan Singer, 24, an Israeli-Canadian volunteer with the Israeli non-profit organization Ach Gadol.

While visiting his family in Toronto this month, Singer helped raise awareness about Ach Gadol, speaking to high school students at Temple Sinai about the work the organization does.

Ach Gadol, which translates to "big brother," is a volunteer-driven non-profit that was founded five years ago with the mission to provide assistance and support to what Israelis call "lone soldiers" – those serving in the Israel Defence Forces whose families don't live in Israel.

In addition to co-ordinating social events, lectures and skills-building and cultural workshops for lone soldiers, Ach Gadol matches former lone IDF soldiers with those who are currently enlisted.

By doing so, it creates an infrastructure of support that ensures that lone soldiers have someone to turn to when dealing with issues of any kind.

"It's a way for them to have someone who can speak with them at eye level... Someone to turn to about just about anything, whether it's a problem they're having with the army, understanding their rights or wanting to know about studying in Israel after the army," said Singer, who was born in Israel but raised in Toronto and was drafted into the IDF in 2011 after making aliyah.

He and fellow Ach Gadol volunteers are assigned to act as mentors to small groups of lone soldiers living, when off base, in apartments funded by the American organization Friends of The Israel Defence Forces.

"I'm supposed to [visit] and make sure everything is OK with them," Singer, who is currently studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, said.

At present, 200 volunteers have been assigned to support about 400 lone soldiers, and Ach Gadol hopes to recruit more volunteers and further expand its reach.

Daniel Aharon, Ach Gadol's founder and CEO, said the organization also helps prepare about 200 prospective lone soldiers for the army each year.

"Through joining the IDF, learning Hebrew and understanding Israeli culture, lone soldiers become true Israelis and an integral part of our society. Many lone soldiers do this with the help of their 'big sister' or 'big brother,' " he said.

The volunteers are mainly students or young professionals, and the lone soldiers include those who have come from countries all over the world to volunteer in the IDF or make aliyah as well as Israelis who have lost, or are estranged from, their families.

Though he said he was lucky to have been drafted into the army with a number of his friends from yeshiva and put up on weekends by the family of a rabbi he knew, Singer acknowledged the overall difficulty of being a lone soldier, especially when Israeli culture is foreign.

"The army is generally a stressful place, so not having that backbone of your family close by, that support system that everyone else does, definitely makes it that much more intense," he noted.

He cited issues such as navigating army bureaucracy, homesickness and even having to rush home on Fridays to shop and cook for the weekend for oneself, as experiences that can be particularly tough for lone soldiers.

"Israelis who have grown up with [the military culture] are more used to it. There can be cultural differences in terms of knowing how to work the system. If you're Israeli and say, you had an older brother who was in the army before and can tell you what to expect at every stage, that's easier," Singer said.

Aharon stressed that Ach Gadol volunteers serve as mediators to help lone soldiers "work with the system instead of against it, and become capable, confident young adults."

To expand its operations, the organization hopes to cultivate both awareness and funds from Jewish communities in North America, and Aharon said Passover is an apt time to consider the difficulties faced by lone soldiers.

"[At this time], we remember the challenges that the Jewish people have gone through, where we started out and how we became the nation we are today... These young adults are our future. It's our obligation to strengthen their connection to their Jewish roots and to the state of Israel." ■

Federation honours community power couple

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (UJA) will be honouring Ted and Elizabeth Sokolsky for their leadership and vision with a dedication ceremony to name the Ted and Liz Sokolsky Community Square, at the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

The May 3 event will feature a community dessert reception hosted by Julia Koschitzky.

"I hope many people will come out to celebrate the dedication, because what Ted and Liz have done has been of great benefit to this community," said Morris Perlis, chair of UJA Federation's board of directors.

The Ted and Liz Sokolsky Community Square will be an attractively landscaped outdoor square at the heart of the Lebovic Campus. The facility was built during Ted's tenure as CEO of federation and houses the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, the northern branch of Bialik Hebrew Day School, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre, as well as a number of community social service agencies.

"The campus is a roaring success. We have approximately 7,500 to 8,000 members. It's a gem in the crown of the Jewish community today," said Leo Goldhar, a past UJA Campaign chair and past federation board member who was active in the campus' planning and construction.

"We wanted to honour Ted and Liz for their visionary work that they have done."

Ted Sokolsky, 63, retired last September after 28 years with the federation, the last 10 as president and CEO. Prior to that, he served as senior campaign associate, associate campaign director, annual campaign director and vice-president for integrated fundraising.

His accomplishments include managing the extraordinary growth of UJA's annual campaign, which has increased from $32 million in 1995 to more than $56 million today, making it the third-largest campaign in the North American federation system, surpassed only by New York and Chicago.

Ted also spearheaded the planning and implementation of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, a $350-million capital project known today as the Tomorrow Campaign, the largest-ever redevelopment of Toronto's Jewish community infrastructure. As well, he oversaw the growth of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, which resulted in the rapid expansion of its assets from $120 million in 2004 to $253 million today, with another $300 million in planned gifts (bequests and gifts of life insurance).

Liz and Ted Sokolsky

In 2013, Ted became president of the World Conference of Jewish Communal Service Workers.

Elizabeth (Liz) Sokolsky, 55, has been a Jewish communal professional for 30 years. She began her career in Jewish experiential education as the assistant director of BBYO in Montreal. From there, she spent three years in Ottawa at its Jewish community centre, where she was responsible for youth and teen programs, and summer camp.

After marrying Ted, she moved to Toronto, where she spent nine years at the JCC, culminating in her position as branch director. Her roots at BBYO led her to leave the JCC and to become national director of BBYO Canada for the next three years.

In 1996, Liz became the national executive director of the newly created Canada Israel Experience, which was established in order to significantly increase both the quantity of participants and quality of Israel experience programs for Canadian teens and young adults.

Liz is currently vice-president of education and operations for Taglit-Birthright Israel in North America. She has been with this innovative and highly successful program since its inception in 1999.

"Liz has been an incredible force in the Birthright program and is an outstanding community person," Goldhar said. ■ it appeared to be waiting for him. When it bounded off, he followed. The hare arrived at an immense rock that was split in two. Three or four powerful leaps carried the hare through the slot between the rock's two halves. The rock stood taller than Heinrich, and was shaped like a rounded hill. The hare emerged out the other side of the passage through the centre of the giant stone. Sniffing the air, it held still, as if waiting for someone or something. Heinrich entered the slit. No sunlight entered with him.

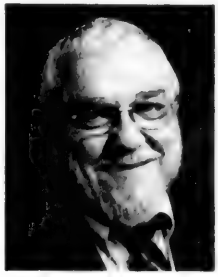
Film pays tribute to Hamilton rabbi

ABIGAIL CUKIER
SPECIAL TO CJN HAMILTON



Rabbi Zev Eisenstein

It seems everyone who knew Rabbi Zev Eisenstein has a story about the positive impact he had on their lives.

So it seems only fitting that as a tribute to his life, Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA) is producing a documentary of people sharing their stories about the rabbi, who died last November at age 75.

The film, It's a Beautiful Day, will premiere May 12 at the annual Hamilton Hebrew Academy Gala Tribute Dinner.

Rabbi Eisenstein was the principal of HHA for 28 years, retiring in 2001. He remained as a teacher until 2011. His motto was "It's a beautiful day." Every morning, he would open the door to the school and greet each student with those words.

"He touched so many people in countless ways. People from all strata of life – students, parents, people in the business world, people he met at RV parks while camping," said Rabbi Daniel Green of Adas Israel Congregation of Hamilton, who is also dean of HHA. "He was there for people in times of death and at joyous occasions. He had a profound impact on people in a variety of ways."

The film was shot in Toronto, Israel and Hamilton, with people from all areas of Rabbi Eisenstein's life coming to share their stories.

"Similar themes came up over and over again," Rabbi Green said. "So many said, 'He was like a second father to me.' They knew he was there and that he was someone you could always rely upon.

"Rabbi Eisenstein savoured the opportunity to give to other people. If you are woken in the middle of the night to help with a family dispute or to go to the hospital, there is an element of it being the last thing in the world you want to do. For Rabbi Eisenstein, it was the first thing he wanted to do. He wanted to be there for people in meaningful ways."

One of Rabbi Green's favourite examples of Rabbi Eisenstein's impact came from the head of a company where Rabbi Eisenstein was a kashrut inspector.

"He told me he didn't need [kashrut] certification," Rabbi Green said. "He told me, 'I pay so I can have a visit from Rabbi Eisenstein a couple of times a year. It's worth the money, and I don't want that to stop.' That is the most fitting testimony for him."

In addition to the film, the It's a Beautiful Day Fund aims to create a legacy of love and inclusivity through three projects: the Diverse Learning Centre, which provides instruction and resources for special needs students; a scholarship fund to enable children whose families may not have the resources to experience an HHA education; and transportation services for Jewish children who have no access to Jewish day school because of their geographic location in the Niagara, Halton and Kitchener areas.

Funds will be raised through the sale of leaves on the school's Tree of Life memorial wall, which will be dedicated in honour of Rabbi Eisenstein.

"We want to give back," said Rabbi Green. "We want to make sure that what Rabbi Eisenstein built and gave his life to is able to perpetuate and build into the future."

Key goal caps player's career

Casey Rosen and family at the OUA final.

PAUL LUNGEN

Casey Rosen doesn't score a lot of goals, but when she does, they're memorable.

Known more for her penalty-killing and leadership, Rosen scored the final goal as the Western Mustangs rocked defending champs McGill Martlets 5-0 in the CIS (Canadian Interuniversity Sport) Women's Hockey Championship.

The tally came on her last-ever shift in her last-ever game as a collegiate hockey player. Rosen will be graduating this year with a bachelor of science degree, with a double major in biology and physiology.

Scoring the way she did with about a minute left marked a nice bookend to a career that began when she was a freshman four years ago and had to replace an injured player. She scored twice in her first game to impress Mustangs head coach Chris Higgins. "She scored two goals, and she's not missed a game since then," Higgins said.

Throughout her career, Rosen scored 18 goals and 10 assists in 70 regular season games. But she says her role wasn't to be a scorer. In fact the Mustangs, eventual Ontario University Athletics and CIS champions, had a hard time scoring goals all season. They played a lot of low-scoring, one-goal games.

But the team stressed defence and rode a strong 200-foot game to a remarkable 28-1-3 record including playoffs, which Rosen admits "was crazy." There's lots of talent on the team, she said. "We didn't rely on one person. We kept changing the lineup and found what worked. Everybody got points."

Rosen's main contribution was a strong forecheck and harassing the opposing defence. "We get the other team on their heels. We pressure them and cause them to be frazzled. My parents say when I'm on the ice, I'm like a hurricane," she said.

Rosen, who played right wing, got a lot of time on the penalty kill and toward the end of the season, on the power play, too. Higgins said Rosen had a key role on the Mustangs's penalty killing and provided energy. "Her biggest contribution to the team was through leadership," he added.

One of two co-captains, she was looked up to by the others, Higgins said. "Everyone listens to whatever she has to say."

"We bonded and had a close group," Rosen said.

Rosen comes from a hockey family. Her dad, Ian, still plays, as do her brothers, Neil and Jamie. Her parents, Neil and Annegail, came to every game she played this season, from North Bay in the north to Windsor in the south. They even flew out to Calgary for the CIS championship.

A United Synagogue Day School and Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate, she excelled in hockey, softball and field hockey and was TanenbaumCHAT's female athlete of the year. Prior to joining the Mustangs, she played for the Toronto-Leaside Junior Wildcats. ■

IAW 'demeans' anti-apartheid struggle, Cotler tells S. Africans

plungen@thecjn.ca

Irwin Cotler, the McGill University law professor and former minister of justice, once served as the legal counsel for South African freedom fighter Nelson Mandela.

He had a close-up view of the horrors of apartheid and has long believed that Israel was being unfairly tarnished with the false accusation of being an "apartheid state."

During a recent visit to South Africa, he told MPs, political leaders and members of the Jewish community that the allegation of apartheid levelled at Israel demeans the real struggle for equal rights in South Africa.

He also urged South African leadership to use their moral authority to advocate for human rights abuses around the world, in places like Venezuela, Iran and Saudi Arabia.

Cotler, Liberal MP for Mount Royal, was in South Africa to take part in events marking the 60th anniversary of the Freedom Charter, what he called "the iconic moral compass of the anti-apartheid movement that inspired the creation of a free, democratic, egalitarian and non-racial South Africa, with Nelson Mandela, an honorary Canadian citizen, as its first president."

During his recent South African visit, Cotler met with Susan Shabangu, the country's minister responsible for women, Tshililo Michael Masutha, the minister of justice, and Jeff Radebe, minister of the presidency. He also witnessed a BDS-Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) rally outside the venue where he was speaking. He met with some of the demonstrators, and found many had been bused in and didn't even know why they were there.

But in his meetings with South African leaders, both secular and Jewish, he made the case that "IAW demeans the real authentic anti-apartheid struggle. It betrays the real anti-apartheid struggle," which he called central to his own identity.

"Israel is responsible for human rights violations," he said. "No one is saying Israel is above the law, only that it should be held to the same standard as all other countries. Nobody is saying human rights standards should not be applied in Israel. But they should be applied equally to everyone."

> No one is saying Israel is above the law, only that it should be held to the same standard as all other countries. Nobody is saying human rights standards should not be applied in Israel. But they should be applied equally to everyone.

Cotler said "the shame of the anti-apartheid movement" is that it is discriminating by singling out Israel for condemnation while invoking anti-apartheid rhetoric to justify it. "It gives the real human rights violators exculpatory immunity. It shames the real anti-apartheid legacy, and is hypocritical," he said.

Cotler said he thought the South African MPs "were receptive" to his position.

He also urged them to make speaking out against resurgent anti-Semitism a priority and he called on South African leaders to speak out about human rights abuses in Iran.

He noted in particular the case of Hossein Kazemeyni Boroujerdi, an ayatollah who has received an 11-year sentence for insulting Islam. Boroujerdi had called for the separation of religion and state and he had condemned anti-Semitism.

Boroujerdi is known as the Mandela of Iran, making his cause particularly significant for South Africa, Cotler pointed out.

As to Venezuela, he said the country is morphing from an authoritarian state into a dictatorship. The democratic opposition is being jailed and one-third of the country's mayors are in prison, he said.

In Saudi Arabia, blogger Raif Badawi was sentenced to 10 years in jail, fined the equivalent of $266,000 (US) and given 1,000 lashes in 50-lash instalments, for insulting Islam, cybercrime and disobeying his father.

Those are the kinds of human rights cases South Africa should be addressing, he suggested. ■

Bialik educator to be honoured for 49 years of service

SHERI SHEFA

Having served Bialik Hebrew Day School for nearly five decades, Ziona Hagler will be honoured for her retirement next month at a gala event to thank her for her dedication to Jewish education in Toronto.

"This is an unprecedented [amount] of time for someone to be at a school. We did check the Guinness Book of World Records," Shana Harris, Bialik's head of school, said with a laugh. "But she didn't qualify. It's probably unprecedented in Toronto."

Harris, who has known and worked with Hagler for 29 years, and whose children were taught by her, said that despite Hagler's 49 years at the school, her energy and passion never wavered.

"That's why we felt that we wanted to honour her with a tribute dinner and really give her the honour she deserves," she said.

The event, scheduled for May 6 at The Warehouse at Downsview Park, will raise funds for the Ziona and Dan Hagler Tuition Support Fund.

In an interview with The CJN, Hagler explained that she moved to Toronto in 1966, after being sent from Israel to Cleveland by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

"I got the job with Bialik before I moved. I was in the [United] States. I was sent by the Jewish Agency to Cleveland, but they begged us to come to Toronto, and they arranged the visa for us," Hagler said.

"The original plan was to stay for a few years and then go back [to Israel]. But I felt that I was doing a mission. And my family in Israel also felt that my mission was to educate children in the Diaspora and to teach them the love of Israel and the language."

Sandy Brown, past president of the school, a board member, and a friend of Hagler's for more than 40 years, said Hagler was the "Zionist heart and soul of the school."

Speaking about all the work she has done to bring extra-curricular activities and programs to the school, Brown said, "that's one of the things... we'll miss when she's gone because I don't know that she's replaceable in that area. It's quite sad in my view, bittersweet, that we'll be missing out on that contribution that she's made to the school," Brown said.

"She has made her work at Bialik her life... she has got a lot of energy and it is infectious. You can't be around her and not feel that you've got to do something," Brown said, adding that Hagler, who is now in her 70s, is a generous, caring, devoted and determined educator.

Harris said that although Hagler hasn't been in a classroom setting for about 20 years, she has been immersed in the co-curricular work, including the shinshinim program, which brings Israeli high school graduates to the Diaspora to volunteer for a year to educate the community about Israel and Israeli culture.

Ziona Hagler

"She's like the savta [grandmother] to the shinshinim," Harris said.

"She really cared deeply about the students and wanted the students to have the best experiences and to develop ahavat Yisrael, a love of Israel, a commitment to Israel, a connection to Israel and I think she worked hard on that."

She added that Hagler also ran all of the Grade 8 graduation trips to cities such as Boston, Washington and New York, and she always put her heart into planning the trips and providing meaningful experiences for the students.

"I think we'll miss her creativity that she put into every celebration that she co-ordinated and her energy and passion for Jewish education," Harris said.

"I think she leaves a very rich legacy at the school in the way she created celebrations and tried to put a spirit of Zionism and Israel in the school."

Hagler said the most rewarding part of her decades at Bialik was witnessing the results of her work.

"When students come to say things like, 'Thank you, it's because of you that we know the language,' those are my rewards," Hagler said.

As for her retirement plans, she said she plans to spend time with her daughter and three grandchildren.

She said she'll miss working with the students, teachers and administration.

"I had a very good time here. Everyone was so good to me," she said. "I'm really very emotional. I never expected such an honour." ■

Toronto unites for Yom Ha'atzmaut

UJA, Israeli Consulate and Jewish Agency partner to mark Independence Day

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

To highlight the daring and creative character of Israeli culture, several leaders from prominent Jewish organizations are hosting a panel event featuring three diverse Israeli speakers.

Talking Tachless: Israeli Speakers Night is being held April 22 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's Al Green Theatre in honour of Israel's 67th Independence Day – Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Panelists Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbivay, the highest-ranking female officer in the Israeli Defence Forces' history; Prof. Raphael Hofstein, the Israeli-born president and CEO of Toronto-based innovation hub MaRS Discovery District and Yaniv Waizman, Tel Aviv city council member and gay rights activist will discuss their career trajectories and accomplishments in the context of what they feel it means to be Israeli.

The event is being organized by Irit Stopper, Israel's deputy consul general in Toronto; Eran Shafir, regional representative of the Jewish Agency for Israel; Lee Mes, director of Israeli-Canadian outreach and engagement at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Dan Horowitz, federation's editorial director and senior writer.

"The message for the whole evening is that Israel is very daring, and that's what makes it so successful and contributes to its survival," said Mes.

The event is part of a larger initiative led collaboratively by the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation and the Israeli Consulate to mark Yom Ha'atzmaut in an innovative and all-encompassing way.

The idea for what the group has dubbed Toronto Celebrates Israel came about a year or so ago, when Shafir and Mes started talking about wanting to do something different for this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

With that, Shafir said, "a unique partnership" between UJA, the Israeli Consulate and the Jewish Agency was born, and, as a group, they began discussing, "Why do just one event? Why not use the love for Israel in the [Toronto Jewish] community as a vehicle to bring people together?"

So, in addition to directly organizing the April 22 event, the group decided to create a platform where all Yom Ha'atzmaut events in the city can be advertised in one central place.

Several weeks ago, they launched the official Toronto Celebrates Israel website, which features a calendar and descriptions of upcoming Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations by schools, synagogues, community centres and even private events held at people's homes.

As of April 8, the website had about 30 events listed, and Mes said they hope to collect more.

She and fellow organizers have been reaching out to organizations – both those they're already affiliated with and those they haven't previously worked with – across the city and spanning the religious and political spectrum.

Part of their goal is to emphasize the diversity that exists within the Toronto Jewish community, Mes explained.

"We're not saying there is one way to celebrate Israel or emphasize the holiday – that is the beauty of this," she said.

Shafir noted that the advantage of advertising a wide variety of events "under one umbrella" is that it will engage a wider reach of people and build strength in the community.

"It's a capacity-building tool... We're showing that we're much stronger when we're together and that we're all part of something bigger than ourselves," he said.

IDF Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbivay

Yom Ha'atzmaut events currently listed on the website run the gamut from a film screening about Zionism at Ryerson University to a celebration for kids at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre's supplementary Hebrew school to a "lunch and learn" with the host of TVO's The Agenda, Steve Paikin, presented by Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The organizers of Toronto Celebrates Israel hope the initiative will happen annually. ■

Overnight CHAT event to raise money for cancer

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wallenberg campus will come together as a community for a Canadian Cancer Society fundraising event aimed at enhancing the quality of life of people with cancer.

TanenbaumCHAT will be the first Jewish day school in the city to run Relay for Life, an overnight, non-competitive 12-hour event. Its fundraising goal is $50,000 and will take place at Esther Shiner Stadium at Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue from May 7 at 7 p.m. until May 8 at 7 a.m.

"The idea is that cancer doesn't sleep, so the 12-hour program is really meant to mirror the experience of a cancer patient. It is meant to be a challenging event where we stay up for 12 hours to raise awareness and raise funds to help those who are dealing with cancer," said teacher Josh Sable, co-director of student activities at the school.

"We start in the light together, we go into the darkness together. We have a period of struggle overnight. We get to 3 or 4 a.m. when we're not sure if we are going to make it or not, and then the sun comes up and we remember. We are ready now to face a new day and its challenges. That really is the goal of the program."

Sable added: "There is a real buzz around the school. It's pretty electric."

Relay For Life is the largest fundraising activity the Canadian Cancer Society runs. In 2014, more than $40 million was raised at some 400 Relay For Life events across Canada.

"Since 1999, Relay For Life events in Canada have raised $439 million toward lifesaving research of all types of cancer and support systems for people going through cancer and their families," said Kyle Smith, youth program specialist with the Canadian Cancer Society.

Event chairs Maxwell Charlat, Lauren Wintraub, and Miya Strauss are part of a 30-student Grade 12 committee organizing the event.

Grade 10 student Joseph Erlick lost his brother Evan to brain cancer in 2006 when Evan was only 13. Erlick will be participating in his memory.

"Evan had two dreams. He dreamed that children who needed cancer treatments like he did could have somewhere they would be able to relax, play with others and just be kids. He also dreamed that someone would find a cure for cancer.

"Our family did everything we could to make Evan's dream a reality. Unfortunately, the world is still trying to help Evan's second dream come true," Erlick said.

The $20 registration fee includes a Relay For Life T-shirt, a security bracelet and a luminary bag – a small bag filled with sand and a candle. Students will be given an online web page and a pledge envelope and are encouraged to raise as much money as possible.

Relay For Life participants walk or run together around the track. Students are grouped to form teams of approximately 10 people. Each team will designate a captain. There will always be a team member walking throughout the event.

Cancer survivors from the Tanenbaum CHAT community – teachers, parents, grandparents, friends, and neighbours – will walk the first lap of the night, a "survivors lap." The community will then join them by walking around the track in solidarity.

"After it gets dark, we remember those that we have lost to cancer by decorating and lighting special bags called 'luminaries' that line the entire track," Sable said.

The event will have entertainment, food and activities running throughout.

"To date, $27,000 has been raised," he said.

"Our organization [Canadian Cancer Society] could not run without schools running these events for us. They make an impact on the fight against cancer," Smith said.

Soccerthon a fun way to support kids with disabilities

SHERI SHEFA

Gilad Epstein, president of the Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro (CFOBIS) hopes that in addition to raising funds for the Israel-based organization through the fifth annual Soccerthon, the event will also serve as an opportunity to raise awareness about the group's work on behalf of people with disabilities in Israel, and to solidify local partnerships.

Epstein said that when he assumed the role of president of the Toronto-based organization more than two years ago, his mandate was to add to the fundraising element by working with the local community to benefit Canadians as well.

"We felt that being the Canadian friends, it's wonderful to promote Beit Issie in Israel, but we also want to have a direct impact on Canadians and our local community. That's the theme of partnerships and that's why I'm so passionate about Soccerthon, because it embodies those values," Epstein said.

The Soccerthon, scheduled for April 26 at the Trio Sportsplex in Woodbridge, Ont., began five years ago as an adult-only tournament.

"Adults came and played a marathon of soccer for three hours at an indoor facility, and each player, each team raised funds, got sponsored by friends and family and that is how it started as a fundraiser."

He said in the first year, the tournament attracted six teams and raised $1,800. This year, the tournament will host 16 teams, and Epstein is confident the funds raised will surpass last year's total of $20,000 to support Beit Issie Shapiro in its mission.

Through Beit Issie Shapiro, there are treatment centres and a day school for children with disabilities, but there is much more than that," Epstein said.

"They've transformed into a research centre, and rather than open branches across the country, they've decided to utilize one location and spread the knowledge through partnerships, through education, through training, through policy and through international impact as well.

"Part of the mission is to promote a society that allows people with disabilities to be included in society, to have opportunities to have lives as close to normal as possible."

As for the upcoming event, Epstein said the soccer has almost become a secondary part of the tournament.

Participants in last year's tournament

"The kids program has become the crown jewel... We've partnered with Camp Aim, a camp for children with disabilities, and we will bring their campers and their caregivers to the event, and we will craft sport activity programs that will be adjusted to different skill sets and ability levels. It will be for all kids and will be inclusive," he said.

"We will have six indoor fields running in parallel for four hours – three hours of play – and one field will be dedicated to kids. In previous years, these were the kids of the players... This year, we've collaborated with a few partners... We will run our first inclusive program."

He said each team represents a country, such as Canada, Israel, Brazil or Argentina, and each team is responsible for raising a minimum of $1,000.

Other organizations, including Camp Breakaway, a Jewish Orthodox summer day camp for boys and girls; DANI, a non-profit that works to create employment, training and educational opportunities for adults with cognitive, emotional and/or physical challenges, and Maccabi Canada, have also partnered with CFOBIS on the Soccerthon.

"Recently, we were approached by the Jewish Agency [for Israel]... They want to create 67 events in commemoration of the 67th Independence Day of Israel and they were looking for events around the city, so we're partnering with them and this will be one of the 67 events."

DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, is also participating in the event.

"He will be there for the opening ceremony to welcome the crowd, and he will also be playing on Team Israel with his children," Epstein said, adding that he's expecting up to 500 people at the event. ■

GUEST VOICE

It would mean so much if you join us on Yom Hazikaron

Sara Dobner

There is one event in the Jewish calendar year in Toronto where you are sure to find more Israeli Canadians than native Canadians in attendance. That is Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Memorial Day, which honours all of the Jewish state's fallen soldiers and victims of terrorism.

While it is not a religious holiday, this day is one the holiest days in the Israeli calendar and is deeply ingrained in modern Israeli society and the Israeli psyche. This is the one day when we are all united as one family in deep grief, memories and thoughts, sharing our collective existential destiny.

The intense passion that Israelis have in remembering those who have paid the ultimate price for the continued existence of the Jewish homeland exists both in Israel and in the Diaspora. This is a nation where most people have served in the army, where many have friends and family members – fathers, sons and brothers – who never came back from the battlefield, and where there are dozens of songs and poems dedicated to the fallen. This is the one day when all the conflicts, politics, debates and disagreements that so uniquely characterize Israeli society take a back seat.

In 1951, the fourth of the Hebrew month of Iyar was declared by the Israeli Knesset as Yom Hazikaron. It is always one day before Israel's Independence Day, so that when we celebrate our independence, we do not forget our debt to those who are no longer with us and to whom we owe our country and our independence. This year, we will remember 23,137 fallen soldiers and victims of terrorism who lost their lives since 1860, the year when Jews were first allowed to live in Palestine outside of Jerusalem's Old City walls.

Yom Hazikaron in Israel has always been unique, as it is a day when all public and entertainment venues are closed. There are two sirens sounded, during which everybody observes a two-minute halt of all traffic and daily activities. And all of Israel's radio and television stations broadcast, throughout the day, programs about the lives and heroic acts of fallen soldiers, along with Israeli songs.

Growing up in Israel, some Yom Hazikaron rituals became part of our identity. For years, we read Nathan Alterman's poem, written during the 1948 War of Independence, Magash Hakesef (The Silver Platter), at every Yom Hazikaron ceremony. And almost every Israeli remembers the memorial corner in their school that was filled with pictures of school graduates who fell in one of Israel's wars. Some schools invite the families of the fallen graduates to participate in their ceremonies. School children dress in blue and white, while thousands of soldiers in uniform make their way to military cemeteries across the country.

The unique atmosphere of this day that Israelis are used to explains why many feel out of place on Yom Hazikaron when they are outside Israel. As I mourn my personal loss, like so many others, I have a wish that I know I share with many Israeli Canadians, a wish that the warm Jewish community of Toronto will come out in large numbers and share with us our sorrow on this special day.

Israeli Canadians and Canadian Jews have learned, over the years, to recognize the cultural differences between them and have made considerable efforts to learn about each other's unique manifestations of Jewish life, and to build bridges. Yom Hazikaron represents one of those unique Israeli existential experiences and, therefore, presents an opportunity for Canadian Jews to add one more building block to the bridge by taking part in it.

We hope to see you at the Yom Hazikaron ceremony this year. It would mean so much to us if you join us. ■

Sara Dobner is a member of the board of directors at Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and chair of the Israeli Identity Program, Hamifgash Program at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre. Toronto's official Yom Hazikaron ceremony will be held on April 21 at 7:30 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The program is in both Hebrew and English. A program with Israeli songs will follow after the ceremony.

Three vie for Mount Royal Tory candidacy on April 26

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Neil Drabkin entered the race March 26.

The winner of the vigorously contested right to be the Tory candidate in Mount Royal, a federal riding that has been Liberal for 75 years, will be known April 26 when the party holds its nomination meeting.

The three contenders are ex-Côte St. Luc mayor and Montreal executive committee member Robert Libman, former TVA broadcaster Pascale Déry and lawyer Neil Drabkin.

An early entrant, Beryl Wajsman, editor of the Suburban, withdrew shortly before the March 26 deadline, while Drabkin, a former chief of staff to two of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's ministers, entered near the cut-off.

The Liberal candidate in the election, expected to be held Oct. 19, is Anthony Housefather, mayor of Côte St. Luc, who was chosen last fall. Liberal Irwin Cotler, Mount Royal MP since 1999, announced more than a year ago he won't seek re-election.

Libman, 54, who was first out of the gate in September, is an architect who co-founded and was an MNA for the provincial Equality Party after his upset victory in the staunchly Liberal D'Arcy McGee in 1989.

Déry, 38, a political newcomer, announced her bid in January, when Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney spoke in support of her nomination.

Both Déry and Libman have been actively campaigning and signing up party members, which is key to their chance of capturing the nomination. The deadline for becoming a member was April 2 at midnight.

Drabkin, who will be 54 in May, said he entered the race late after appeals by longtime Tories in the riding, who are concerned "the contest between the two existing candidates has become so polarized that the Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jewish communities are being pitted against each other. This, they believe, will result in division in the community come the federal election... and, thereby, damage our party's chances of winning the seat."

Drabkin said he has earned the respect of both parts of the community because of his years of experience, and "those longtime Conservatives... believe that I have the credibility and stature to unite the membership... behind out prime minister."

He was chief of staff to then-natural resources minister Joe Oliver and, prior to that to Stockwell Day, who held portfolios in Harper's cabinet. Drabkin began his political career in 1984 working for Gerry Weiner, who became a Mulroney cabinet minister.

Drabkin has run unsuccessfully for Parliament five times since 1993, for the Progressive Conservatives, the Canadian Alliance and the Conservatives, including twice in Mount Royal in 1993 and 2006. He ran for the Tories in Westmount-Ville Marie in 2011.

Libman said it speaks well for the party and Harper that four qualified people sought to run. Less than a decade ago, the Tory flag-bearer in Mount Royal would have been considered a sacrificial lamb, but Liberal support has been eroding, and, in 2011 election, Cotler garnered only 41 per cent of the vote, well down from the 90-plus per cent he once enjoyed, and only about 2,200 votes ahead of Conservative Saulie Zajdel.

The Tories are working very hard to take Mount Royal, banking on Harper's strong support for Israel among Jewish voters, who represent 35 per cent of the population and traditionally turn out to vote. Currently, the Conservatives hold only five of the 75 Quebec seats and none in Montreal.

But Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau is determined not to lose Mount Royal, which his late father, Pierre Trudeau, held for two decades. And how strong support for Harper remains among non-Jews is not as clear.

Libman said at this point, it's all about getting the vote out. He said the official list of Conservative members in Mount Royal has not yet been compiled, but said he's done "extremely well" signing up members at $15 per person. (The Liberals' fee was $10.)

The rather late nomination meeting call means the "snowbirds" supporting Libman will be back in Montreal, but it has also given Déry more time to gather people.

She said she's confident she'll win on April 26. "My campaign has gone very, very well. I've had a great response on the ground and reached out to many, many communities, those in TMR and Côte des Neiges, as well as Côte St. Luc and Hampstead.

"Having entered a little late, I have had to work hard to catch up... but I'm pretty confident about the nomination."

Asked if it's fair to describe her as the party favourite, Déry said that, "at the end of the day, this is a mathematical process – it's about the number of members you sign and get out to the meeting."

Libman is touting the approximately 40 public endorsements he's received from prominent people in the riding, while Déry, who left a 15-year career in TV journalism, said that experience made her aware of the key issues and has given her the skills and contacts that would be assets as an MP. ■

Leon Katz: biomedical technology innovator

FLORALOVE KATZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Leon and Ruth Katz, left, with Aline and former prime minister Jean Chretien at Leon Katz's Order of Canada investiture in 2008

The Ten Commandments appear twice in the Bible – in Exodus and Deuteronomy – and the sixth commandment is "Honour thy father and mother."

Accordingly, I offer this tribute to my beloved father, Leon Katz, a friend and mentor to many. He was born Dec. 24, 1924 in Montreal and died on Jan. 9 in Ottawa of mesothelioma and lung cancer.

Throughout my parents' lives, they never sought the limelight, but rather preferred obscurity and utter modesty. But my father received both the Order of Ontario and the officer level of the Order of Canada, and he received the Living Legend Award from the World Society of Cardio-Thoracic Surgeons. He received member emeritus status from the Canadian Medical and Biological Engineering Society, which gave him particular pleasure, because it represented recognition by a college of his peers. And my dad – a founder of the Engineering Institute of Canada – was named a fellow at last year's awards ceremony.

It was only after these recognitions that even our closest family members first learned of his cutting edge pioneering biomedical engineering work. Some of them actually thought my dad was a roofer!

My dad's professional biography from 1950 onward parallels, in a real sense, the arrival, development, and growth of biomedical technology and engineering in the medical world. A fortuitous historical congruence of circumstances shaped his career. The end of World War II released new technologies and scientists for civilian use: everything from transistors and other solid-state devices to radioactive isotopes for medical purposes became available.

Into this confluence of explosive developments stepped Leon Katz, academically trained as an electronics engineer and then as a student of human physiology. It was Katz's fortuitous pairing of academic subjects that enabled him to marry the new world of technology with the world of medicine. His innovative mind, his willingness to go where no one before had tried, his excellence in both creating original medical devices and using them in clinical practice, and his in-depth knowledge of both the industrial and health-care worlds all led to his important original contributions in an astonishing array of medical specialties.

My dad conceived, designed, hand-crafted, and trained hundreds of people in the operation of

- Canada's first heart-lung pump for open-heart surgery
- Canada's first fetal heart monitor
- Infant incubators (of which three tiny users, many decades later, were his own grandsons!)
- A high-speed contrast injector for angiography.

Dad frequently operated these new devices during literally hundreds of clinical procedures, in part because he was the only person who knew how to do so. For example, operating his own original heart-lung bypass machine, he was the perfusionist for Canada's first successful open-heart surgery (on a small boy) and for thousands of subsequent surgeries.

My dad particularly delighted in eager, young minds. Among hundreds of his students were cohorts of nurses – including Les Soeurs Grises, for whom he had inordinate respect. To the end of the 1950s, those remarkable nuns managed the complex administration of – and gowned up for surgeries in – hospitals across the province of Quebec. My dad trained them all to gauge the sensitivity with their fingers of the most finely calibrated devices. He trained respirologists and worked with many dozens of anesthesiologists.

At the beginning of January, my father used some of his last gasps of breath – before mesothelioma and lung cancer, diagnosed only in mid-December, choked the very life out of him – to describe how remarkable it was that back then, an engineer could actually place his hands on the patient during hundreds of surgical procedures – a phenomenon totally unheard of today.

In the early 1950s, my dad was one of two biomedical engineers at the Montreal Neurological Institute, providing renowned neurosurgeon Dr. Wilder Penfield with the instruments, tools, and services he used to treat brain-related diseases and make his dramatic discoveries of the human brain.

In 1953, two visionary staff members of the Montreal Jewish General Hospital decided to explore the possible medical applications of I131, the radioactive isotope of iodine that had recently become available from Atomic Energy of Canada's Chalk River reactor. They discovered my dad's unique talents and hired him as a physicist.

Undaunted by the new challenges of radiation physics (a complete departure from his work in electrical engineering and neurophysiology), my dad organized the first clinical radio-isotope laboratory in Quebec (and possibly in Canada) that became the first hospital customer for I131 from Atomic Energy of Canada.

From 1955 to 1960, my dad served as founder and director, department of bio-medical engineering, chef, service de biophysique; and first cardio-pulmonary bypass perfusionist, at the Institut de Cardiologie, Montréal, working with Senator, Dr. Paul David.

At Health and Welfare Canada in the 1970s and '80s, dad transitioned from clinical work to legislative. Moving to Ottawa, he became the first chief, diagnostic devices division, and evaluation and standards division, bureau of medical devices, in the health protection branch. Among his many contributions that likely affected millions worldwide was his team's discovery and correction of the backflow hazard from contaminated evacuated blood collection tubes used to gather blood samples. His article published in the Lancet garnered international attention and led to recalls of tainted tubes across Britain and the United States, before they followed Canada's lead in amending their own legislation requiring sterilization.

Notwithstanding the grinding poverty of my father's early years, born and raised in Montreal through the Depression, his parents taught him and his siblings to cherish the value of education and music. My dad's love of opera and the great symphonic works was inculcated from a poor little radio played continuously by my grandmother as she earned her few weekly pennies on the Singer sewing machine at which she worked day and night.

At 17, my dad volunteered for the Canadian Army, ultimately serving in the latter years of World War II as an officer in the British Army, in the American Zone, in the Rhine with 400 Welsh and Scots under his command, implementing the MilGov (Military Government) laws.

At a time when anti-Semitic quotas limited the number of Jews allowed into Canadian universities, my father's brilliant mind served as his ticket to enter. His graduation as an electrical engineer, followed by his further pairing of physiology, biology, physics, chemistry courses, charted breakthroughs that garnered Canada international recognition. Dad was too busy conceiving, testing, inventing, hand crafting, training, and rushing from hospital to emergency room setting, from clinic to lab to ever pause to patent anything. His primary focus was on patient care and delivery of safe and effective devices.

I believe that my father's desperation and need, and that of his impoverished parents, bred his ingenuity, mental dexterity, innovation and skills that enabled him to conceive entire solutions out of bits and pieces of randomly found items.

My dad was an outstanding father who challenged our brains in unusual ways and stretched our belief in our own capacities. He fashioned the stuff of dreams out of hard economic reality. He and our mother taught us that nothing comes without hard work and dedication to academia and career. This commitment extended to our musical endeavours, athletic undertakings, family, community, Canada and a safe, secure, mutually supportive international community.

He is survived by his devoted and remarkable wife of 65 years, Ruth Gottlieb Katz, his offspring Michael (Cynthia), Geoffrey, Floralove, Shelley (Diana), and his four outstanding grandsons, David, Nathan, Aidan and Benjamin.

My dad's was a life of dedication, purpose and service, a life of love of family, of the essential values and ethics of Judaism, like his parents before him, of guidance to, and assistance for the betterment of the lives of others. My father embodied tikkun olam – healing the world – and my life will be in permanent deficit by virtue of his absence every day. Canada is blessed to have had him as our citizen. And I am blessed to have had him as my father. ■

Artist pays tribute to Holocaust survivors' resilience

JANICE ARNOLD

Abe Pinchuk swam almost every day in his condo pool with another resident, also a retired businessman of about his age. They became friendly, but it was a few years before Pinchuk learned that his companion was a Holocaust survivor.

Little by little, Pinchuk found out that this Hungarian native had, from the age of 15 in 1944, survived five concentration camps including Auschwitz, and the death marches.

He lost his mother and several siblings. He himself barely lived, and was almost left for dead by the liberating U.S. army. He came to Montreal as a war orphan. Yet, the man seemed quite content, had enjoyed a degree of prosperity and he and his wife, whom he married here, had two sons and a growing number of grandchildren.

Although Pinchuk had made most of his living in the textile trade, he was always an artist, and an accomplished one at that, best known for his landscapes.

"There was something about his story, which I gathered piecemeal, that moved me, that convinced me I had to create something that would tell the story of how he – and many other survivors – despite what they went through, not only survived but rebuilt their lives, were fruitful as the Bible says, and that their children and grandchildren are carrying that on.

"And these survivors did so with courage, dignity and determination."

But there was one obstacle for Pinchuk, now 85. "I would never have touched the Holocaust with a 10-foot pole. I felt I did not have the right to. I'm not a survivor. I was born in Montreal. My parents came here in 1905 fleeing the pogroms after the Russian Revolution," said Pinchuk, who grew up the son of a poor shoemaker. He was able to study for three years at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts thanks to a scholarship recognizing his precocious talent.

Pinchuk's hesitation proved to be unwarranted. His pool pal liked the idea and so began Pinchuk's months-long work on a painting entitled How 77835 Defied the Nazi Final Solution that included reading up on the history of the Holocaust, as well as many hours at the easel.

His subject had one caveat: that the identity of 77835 – the number the Nazis assigned to him, which he wore on an ankle shackle – not be revealed.

The painting, an 8-foot by 4-foot triptych in oil, is having its first public exhibition in the Federation CJA Cummings House lobby until April 28, sponsored by the Jewish Public Library and Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre. The exhibition is part of the annual Yom Hashoah commemoration.

The three panels follow the journey of 77835. The first depicts a group of bewildered inmates in striped uniforms as they emerge from the camp after liberation. In the front row on the left is 77835. He's the only one with blues stripes instead of black.

In the second scene is a happy young couple under the chupah – 77835 and his bride, painted from their actual wedding photo. He is in a blue suit. Behind them are many of the former inmates, looking healthier and well dressed.

In the final panel, two other young couples marry – his sons and daughters-in-law (also accurate portraits) – and children frolic. 77835 can be seen walking off in the distance with his grandchildren (he now has five and two great-grandchildren). He's wearing a blue windbreaker with a Star of David on the back. It echoes the symbol he was forced to wear in the first scene; this time he wears it with pride, Pinchuk said.

Blue, of course, is the colour associated with the State of Israel.

The work is also divided into three horizontally. The lowest stratum is the life story. Above that are disturbing scenes of the death camps, their oven doors open, the train tracks and barbed wire.

The camp buildings are all ablaze. "Let them burn in hell forever," Pinchuk said.

By the third panel the smoke has cleared, and the tracks no longer seem menacing.

The uppermost layer of sky repeats this progression from darkness to light, as the storm clouds give way to sunshine.

"The first time he and his wife [who is European-born but not a survivor] saw the painting, they both cried," said Pinchuk. "It's a legacy for them and their family."

77835 told The CJN matter-of-factly, "That's the story of my life after the war. I had some success and a nice family."

As someone who has spoken to students about the Holocaust, he recognizes the painting's educational value. "Everybody has to know these things," he said. "We have to talk about it."

Pinchuk is now seeking a permanent home for the painting, preferably on this continent, where the story can continue. ■

Charges a result of shift in German law

"He explained that his hope is to have a precedent set and perhaps a new law for the future, where no terrorists [can] claim they are innocent because they didn't actually cut someone's head off or pull the trigger," Bohm said. "He hoped to have a new law for aiding and abetting to be used against anyone, no exception."

Groening, 93, was charged under that legal definition. Walther has conceded that inmates would not have seen the Nazi guard at Auschwitz because he worked behind the scenes. It was his job to oversee the theft of all cash, jewelry and valuables of arrivals as they were herded off the trains, earning him the moniker "the Bookkeeper of Auschwitz."

The charges against him are the result of a recent shift in German law, credited to Walther, under which those who did not directly commit atrocities may still be prosecuted as "cogs" in the Nazi death machine.

Testifying against and seeing Groening are "not something I look forward to," Bohm said. "But it's something exceptional that I never thought I would have in my life. [It] seems like fate, and I have to be there."

But, she added, "vengeance is not mine. It's not my makeup."

Max Eisen, a local Shoah educator and speaker, also in Toronto, will be cutting short his March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel to testify at Groening's trial.

Eisen, 85, said he has unique insight into theft at Auschwitz, where he worked in a hospital and operating theatre. Guards would take patients from the wards to the gas chambers, "and [they] came back with bloody rags containing molars filled with gold crowns. I had to remove the gold crowns. I had to do this dirty work for them. They were stealing and [Groening] was the bookkeeper. He was collecting all the loot and they were looting."

Eisen said he'd like to see Groening get a life sentence, but instead of jail, spend the rest of his life telling students about racism and anti-Semitism. "At least he would do something productive. Would it help? I don't know. But it's important that he's brought to court. At least there is a record that you pay for your bad deeds sooner or later."

Asked what he would say to Groening, Eisen replied: "How could you as a person be in a place like that, where all this killing and gassing was going on, and collect gold when you knew what was happening to these people? Did you have a conscience? Did you feel that you were hiding behind [the] 'I was following orders' [defence]?"

Local Auschwitz survivor Katherine Zahavi, who turns 86 this month and lost more than 40 family members in the Holocaust, told The CJN "there's not a day" she doesn't have memories of the camp. "You never forget that, not for a minute."

She said her decision to testify at Groening's trial caused friction with her only surviving relative, a sister, who lives in Israel. "She said, 'How could you go there? How could you step foot in Germany?' I said, 'you know what? This is my revenge for my parents, for my sisters, for my whole family. It is the last thing that I can do.'"

Zahavi said she doesn't feel brave about testifying. "I know it will be very difficult."

Hedy Bohm

For the Canadian co-plaintiffs, at least, the case has a tinge of irony. Inmates' valuables were taken to a warehouse at Auschwitz dubbed "Kanada" by prisoners, who were known as the "Kanada Kommando." To prisoners, Canada symbolized wealth.

As for Groening, he told the German daily Bild in 2005 that he regretted working at Auschwitz, saying he was haunted by the sound of screams from the gas chamber.

"I was ashamed for decades and I am still ashamed today," he said. "Not of my acts, because I never killed anyone. But I offered my aid. I was a cog in the killing machine that eliminated millions of innocent people."

His trial begins April 21. ■

Competing views of Iran deal highlight challenges ahead

RON KAMPEAS
JTA WASHINGTON

Now that the outline for an Iran nuclear agreement has been released – or, more precisely, two outlines, one by Iran, the other by the Obama administration – major gaps have emerged that will need to be resolved ahead of a June 30 deadline for a final deal, including when sanctions on Iran are lifted.

U.S. President Barack Obama and Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, issued conflicting statements on the sanctions issue, with Obama suggesting sanctions would be relaxed only once Iran begins to implement its obligations and Khamenei demanding that all sanctions be suspended upon signing an agreement. Khamenei also vowed that military sites would not be open to nuclear inspectors, which clashes with the American text, which says inspectors have the right to visit suspicious sites "anywhere in the country."

The next round of talks is likely to be held within a few weeks in New York City, and both Obama and Khamenei have said that nothing is agreed until everything is agreed.

In the coming weeks, both sides will endeavour to sell the deal to their various constituencies: Iran to its domestic hardliners, and the Obama administration to Congress, Jewish groups and skeptical allies, Israel chief among them.

What the Obama administration wants to see:

In its outline of a framework accord reached earlier this month in Switzerland, and in subsequent statements and interviews, the Obama administration has focused pre-eminently on the strict limits it is seeking on Iran's capacity to enrich uranium.

These include limiting Iran's advanced centrifuges to scientific research and reducing the number of active first-generation centrifuges, from 19,000 to 5,060, for 10 years. Enrichment would be limited to 3.67 per cent, the level required for medical research and well short of weaponization levels. Iran's stockpile of enriched uranium would be limited to 300 kilograms for 15 years. The deal would also provide for a regimen of intrusive inspections at all Iranian facilities.

"You have assurances that their stockpile of highly enriched uranium remains in a place where they cannot create a nuclear weapon," Obama told National Public Radio last week.

According to the administration's outline, sanctions relief is conditioned on Iran abiding by its commitments. The sanctions architecture will remain in place so they can be quickly reimposed if Iran defaults.

Additionally, Obama administration officials have emphasized that Iran's breakout time will be extended from the current two to three months to a year, although how this will be quantified is not yet clear.

What Iran wants to see:

In contrast with the phased relief outlined in the U.S. document, a "fact sheet" published by the Iranian Foreign Ministry posits an immediate lifting of sanctions after a deal is reached. On April 9, in a speech broadcast live on Iranian television, Khamenei said there would be no point to the negotiations if they did not yield immediate sanctions relief.

"All sanctions should be removed when the deal is signed," Reuters quoted Khamenei as saying. "If the sanctions removal depends on other processes, then why did we start the negotiations?"

On Twitter, Khamenei went further, accusing the United States of overall bad faith.

"Hours after the #talks, Americans offered a fact sheet that most of it was contrary to what was agreed," said a tweet posted on his feed April 9. "They always deceive and breach promises."

On the enrichment question, the Iranian and American outlines are not mutually exclusive.

"None of the nuclear facilities or related activities will be stopped, shut down, or suspended, and Iran's nuclear activities in all of its facilities including Natanz, Fordow, Isfahan, and Arak will continue," said the Iranian document, which goes on to name only Natanz as a site for 3.67 per cent uranium enrichment, which comports with the U.S. document. The other sites are deemed acceptable for scientific research in the American version, a status that conceivably comports with "related activities" in the Iranian document.

What Israel wants to see

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in the immediate wake of the agreement that the framework deal would threaten Israel's survival. He counseled "standing firm and increasing the pressure on Iran until a better deal is achieved."

Netanyahu did not provide details, but in interviews he has said that Israel could tolerate a deal that left "hundreds" of centrifuges in place, as opposed to the 5,060 the U.S. outline anticipates – itself a significant concession for Netanyahu, who had previously said that Israel would tolerate no more than a zero capacity for uranium enrichment.

Yuval Steinitz, Israel's minister of intelligence, also provided more details of Israel's desires for a final deal in a briefing for reporters in Jerusalem, demanding a complete end to research and development of advanced centrifuges, the shuttering of the underground Fordo facility and freedom for inspectors to go "any time, anywhere."

In an op-ed published April 8 in the Washington Post, Moshe Yaalon, the Israeli defense minister, called for dismantling much of Iran's nuclear infrastructure.

"Intelligence and inspections are simply no substitute for dismantling the parts of Iran's program that can be used to produce atomic bombs," Yaalon wrote.

Israel also has an eye on Iran's destabilizing activities elsewhere in the region. The Obama administration and its five negotiating partners – China, Russia, France, Germany and Great Britain – see the nuclear deal as discrete from other Iranian actions.

"Restrictions imposed on the Islamic Republic's nuclear program will expire in about a decade, regardless of Iran's campaign of murderous aggression in Lebanon, Syria, Yemen and elsewhere across the Middle East; its arming, funding, training and dispatching of terrorists around the world; and its threats and violent efforts to destroy Israel, the region's only democracy," Yaalon wrote.

Netanyahu recently also demanded Iran's recognition of Israel as a component of a final deal, a requirement that Obama has said is unrealistic.

What Congress wants to see

Two bills under consideration in Congress, both backed by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, could affect the outcome of an Iran deal.

One sponsored by senators Mark Kirk and Robert Menendez, a Republican and Democrat respectively, would mandate new sanctions should Iran default on a deal or walk away from the talks. Obama has said such a bill would scuttle the talks and has pledged to veto it. The bill was approved in January by the Senate Banking Committee. Now its fate is in the hands of Republican Senator Mitch McConnell, the majority leader, who must decide whether it advances to the full body.

The other bill, backed by Republican Senator Bob Corker, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, would require congressional review of an Iran deal. That bill stands a better chance of passage.

Obama, who had previously said he would veto the Corker bill, indicated that he could work with a modified version. ■

Netanyahu offers alternatives to Iran deal

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has offered alternatives on the nuclear framework agreement with Iran.

Netanyahu released a statement April 12 with the changes to the deal signed earlier this month, a day after U.S. President Barack Obama told reporters that Netanyahu had not provided any alternatives.

The Israeli leader called on the international community to negotiate a better agreement.

In his statement, Netanyahu criticized Iran for insisting in the wake of the agreement on maintaining its nuclear capabilities and refusing to allow nuclear inspections, as well as its continuing aggression in the region.

"Let me reiterate again the two main components of the alternative to this bad deal: first, instead of allowing Iran to preserve and develop its nuclear capabilities, a better deal would significantly roll back these capabilities – for example, by shutting down the illicit underground facilities that Iran concealed for years from the international community," he said.

"Second, instead of lifting the restrictions on Iran's nuclear facilities and program at a fixed date, a better deal would link the lifting of these restrictions to an end of Iran's aggression in the region, its worldwide terrorism and its threats to annihilate Israel."

On April 11, Obama spoke at a news conference at the Americas Summit in Panama City on Netanyahu's failure to come up with alternatives.

"The prime minister of Israel is deeply opposed to it. I think he's made that very clear," Obama said. "I have repeatedly asked: what is the alternative that you present that you think makes it less likely for Iran to get a nuclear weapon? And I have yet to obtain a good answer on that."

The Netanyahu statement came the same day Ha'aretz reported, citing two unnamed Israeli officials, that Netanyahu said at an April 3 meeting of the security cabinet that if a final agreement is signed between Iran and the world powers, the greatest concern is that Tehran will fully implement it without violations.

Netanyahu reportedly said at the meeting – hours before the start of the Passover seder and a day after the framework agreement was signed – that he was concerned that Iran will not break the agreement, waiting until it expires in 10 to 15 years and the country is not considered a threat to restart its nuclear program without the threat of international monitors or sanctions.

The security cabinet decided at the meeting to try to persuade the Obama administration to improve the agreement. Most ministers, however, reportedly believe the best way to halt or alter the agreement is through the U.S. Congress, which is where the most effort will be spent. ■

France set to propose new Palestinian state resolution

RAFA MISMAR
THE MEDIA LINE

The French government has seen a window of opportunity, following recent elections in Israel, to get the United States on board for a renewed effort toward an Israeli-Palestinian agreement, and is preparing a draft UN Security Council resolution.

The draft would define the pre-1967 borders as a reference point for talks, but allow room for exchanges of territory, designate Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state, and call for a fair solution for Palestinian refugees. The French proposal also includes a requirement for Palestinian recognition of Israel as a "Jewish state," Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas informed the executive committee of the PLO. That recognition is an Israeli demand that Abbas has rejected in the past.

The French effort will be based on three steps: first French diplomats will present a draft resolution to the UN Security Council, a step which requires U.S. acquiescence that it will not exercise its veto; second an international peace conference will be held; and the third step will be for France, along with other European allies, to recognize an independent Palestinian state built on the 1967 borders.

Abbas said at the PLO meeting: "We do not need more decisions that then fail to be implemented. It is known that we have 12 resolutions passed by the Security Council (UNSC), including resolutions endorsed by America, but despite these calls for de-colonization, no progress has been made." He went on to reiterate his refusal to recognize Israel as a "Jewish state."

Paris is working with Washington in order to provide cover for new efforts to reach a peace agreement. The French are also seeking to raise support from their European neighbours and from Arab countries.

"While the substance of the French draft may not differ much from past failed efforts to revive Mideast peace talks, France is hoping this time to avoid a U.S. veto at the UNSC because of increasing American frustration with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu," Nabil Shaath, a senior official of the Fatah Central Committee, told the Media Line. Fatah is the Palestinian faction that controls the Palestinian Authority.

Shaath described a possible "back door" for negotiations and said "all actors, including the Americans, now realize that all other ways have been explored, without success."

> The weight of a Security Council resolution would add to international pressure on Israel

After Netanyahu's election win and tough campaign comments against Palestinian statehood, the White House said it would re-evaluate its approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The French official praised the "pretty clear message sent by the Americans." The resolution would aim at presenting a framework for negotiations toward resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"France is working with the U.S. to gain backing for the new peace effort," Shaath said. "France is also seeking support from European and Arab partners." He declined to provide more details on the possible sticking points in the negotiations. The weight of a Security Council resolution, which is legally binding, would add to international pressure on Israel."

Even if a new resolution were to avoid a U.S. veto and win UN backing, its prospects are unclear. Israel remains opposed to returning to the pre-1967 borders and insists that any peace process should include recognition of a Jewish state.

"If we want to have a two-state solution, and if we want to avoid a complete crash, we must go in the same direction," the French foreign minister, Laurent Fabius, told reporters at the United Nations on Friday morning. "I hope the partners who were reluctant in the past will not be so in future."

Fabius declined to say how soon France would bring a draft measure before the council. "We shall work in that direction, yes – our aim is to be efficient," he said. But Fabius also said France would consult with other council members "in the coming days" over a framework for negotiations. Doing this will likely put pressure on the White House to act.

Other European nations will likely recognize a Palestinian state

The French government circulated a draft late in 2014 that would have laid out what are known as parameters for talks between the two sides in the Middle East conflict, and would have set a deadline for completing the talks. The Barack Obama administration was reluctant to support that draft, especially with a general election in Israel approaching.

Shaath said the draft resolution will be based on previous international resolutions passed by Arab and European countries. He also said he expects that other major European powers, including Britain, Germany, Spain and Italy, will join France at the end of this diplomatic process and recognize a state of Palestine based on the 1967 borders.

The French draft decision is based on UN Resolution 181, published on Nov. 29, 1947, which provided for the establishment of two separate states, one Jewish and one Arab, often called the partition plan. Israel accepted the deal, which would have created an independent Palestinian state on 52 per cent of historic Palestine. The current proposals, which call for an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem, would create a Palestinian state on 22 per cent of the area.

Hale Fahoum, Palestinian ambassador to Paris, told the Media Line that the Palestinian Authority views the French move as positive but is waiting to see details of the final version before the Palestinians would give their full approval.

Fahoum said the French would use the pre-1967 borders as a framework to research a route for a new practical border, a border that could take into account changes for mutual land swaps. The French proposal also keeps the door open for discussions on "Jerusalem as the capital of two states," and calls for "a just solution" for Palestinian refugees.

Last year, the UN Security Council rejected a Palestinian resolution demanding an end to Israeli occupation within three years. The United States opposed that draft, saying Palestinian statehood can only be achieved through negotiations with Israel, not through an imposed timetable. ■

Yad Vashem has opened a new exhibit, "Children in the Holocaust: Stars Without a Heaven," about the 1.5 million children who were murdered in the Holocaust, displaying the stories that remained of these children or the stories of the few who survived. On display are items from Yad Vashem's artifacts, art and archives collections. In addition, students from the Bezalel Academy of Art and Design in Jerusalem created works from glass, porcelain and ceramics and students from the Holon Institute of Technology-HIT created short animated clips especially for the exhibition.

Jewish Film Fest heads to the Twilight Zone and beyond

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival returns this spring to project bold new works from around the world onto the big screen, yet a lot of attention will go to programs from the small screen.

The festival, which runs April 30 through May 10, will cater to audiences hoping to binge-watch some of the most exciting new television shows, as well as enjoy retrospective series about "King of Kensington" Al Waxman and Rod Serling of The Twilight Zone fame.

"[Serling] was one of those early TV makers that really wanted to draw attention to, in the immediate postwar years, the Holocaust," says Stuart Hands, the festival's director of programming.

"When he did The Twilight Zone, that was just another way to engage with issues like racism. He wasn't allowed to do it in a more realist mode, so he did it with science fiction."

The festival will screen In the Presence of Mine Enemies an episode of Playhouse 90 that Serling wrote about a family living in the Warsaw Ghetto, on May 2.

The next day, Serling's Emmy-winning TV movie A Storm in Summer, about a friendship between a Jewish deli owner and an African-American boy, will also be screened. Serling's daughter, Anne, will introduce the screenings and speak about her father.

A series on the Jewish writer/director would not be complete without a Twilight Zone episode. The festival will play Walking Distance, considered one of the series' best hours, on May 2 as a free screening.

Among other small-screen sensations, the first three hours of the much-lauded Israeli thriller Hostages will be shown. That show inspired a CBS drama of the same name with Toni Collette and Dylan McDermott.

Also, fans of the Golden Globe-winning series Transparent should not make plans for the evening of May 9. The comedy-drama, starring Jeffrey Tambor as the patriarch of a Jewish family who comes out as transgender, will show four episodes at Canada Square that night and feature a talk from Rabbi Susan Goldberg, a consultant for the series.

"The Jewish elements of the show are quite crucial," Hands tells The CJN. "We're trying to show the different ways that Jewish identity and Jewish self-expression can take form."

This 23rd edition of the festival will spotlight Al Waxman, the Canadian film and television titan who died in 2001.

Fans of King of Kensington, which starred Waxman as convenience store owner Larry King, will want to be at the Royal Ontario Museum on May 2. After showing three of the comedy's best episodes, series creator Perry Rosemond and stars Rosemary Radcliffe and Jayne Eastwood will lead a discussion with the audience.

On May 9, Waxman fans may also want to check out Sun in My Eyes, a little-seen 1960 drama that aired on the CBC. In his acting debut, Waxman played a Jewish man confronting the horrors of life in Nazi-occupied Poland.

"It must be the first Canadian TV attempt to deal with the persecution of Jews by the Nazis," Hands says of that drama.

Of course, there are still films at this festival, which has a lineup of 110 titles from 18 countries.

The festival opens April 30 with the premiere of Dancing Arabs, a new drama from Israeli director Eran Riklis (Lemon Tree). Riklis will be in attendance at the Varsity that evening. The film is based on a semi-autobiographical novel from Sayed Kashua, about an Arab-Israeli's experience at a Jewish boarding school.

The closing night title, Mr. Kaplan, has already premiered to critical and audience adoration around the world. The comedy is about a 76-year-old man trying to capture a German man he believes is a runaway Nazi.

"We don't get many films from Uruguay," Hands says of Mr. Kaplan. "It's a strong and very funny film."

Meanwhile, documentary titles will focus on subjects as wide-ranging as Israeli action movie producers Menachem Golan and Yoram Globus, iconoclastic American comic Irwin Corey and author Isaac Bashevis Singer. The non-fiction film about Singer is told from the perspective of his team of more than 40 female translators – none of whom spoke Yiddish.

Other non-fiction titles will explore the history of Israeli comic books, as well as banned Nazi propaganda reels. The 1984 documentary Spadina, which played to a full house at last year's festival, will screen again on May 2 due to popular demand.

"This year, we have a lot of films dealing with black-Jewish relations," Hands tells The CJN.

Over 30 films are directed by women, a festival record

> This year we have six narrative features directed by Israeli women

Stuart Hands
TJFF DIRECTOR OF PROGRAMMING

Among those titles is Rosenwald, a documentary about early 20th-century philanthropist Julian Rosenwald and his efforts to build schools for African-American communities in the southern United States. The film comes from director Aviva Kempner (The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg).

Rosenwald is one of 31 festival titles directed by women, which Hands says is a record.

"For years, you've had women documentary filmmakers but rarely have you had a lot make narrative features," he says. "This year, we have six narrative features directed by Israeli women."

Some of those female-led titles include Once in a Lifetime, an inspirational French film about inner-city kids doing a project on Nazi concentration camps. That film, from director Marie Castille Mention-Schaar, will receive the Micki Moore prize, for best narrative feature from a woman director.

Director Veronique Lagoade-Segot, meanwhile, will pick up the David A. Stein award for best documentary. Her film, Shoah: The Forgotten Souls of History, is comprised of newsreel footage and looks at how Soviet cameramen who shot this material deleted the mention of Jewish victims.

Other hot titles Hands recommends include Orange People, a drama that deals with Israel's Moroccan community, and The Price of Sugar, a melodrama about Jewish slave owners in 18th century Suriname.

American indie hit Deli Man, which features appearances from Toronto's Zane Caplansky and Cheryl Morantz, will also screen on May 10. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth

Rationale. "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Father-son duo team up in comedy series

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Schitt's Creek, the single-camera, character-driven comedy, has redefined the meaning of family.

The hit CBC TV series was created by Toronto Jewish comedy duo, father and son Eugene and Daniel (Dan) Levy.

Dan Levy is former co-host of MTV Live. He co-wrote, co-hosted and co-produced The After Show and is co-creator, co-executive producer, actor and writer on Schitt's Creek.

Eugene Levy is an alumnus of SCTV in its golden age, often partnering with the legendary John Candy. He has appeared in more than 60 films, earning critical acclaim for co-writing and co-starring in Best In Show, Waiting for Guffman, For Your Consideration and A Mighty Wind.

"I grew up watching the best comedians in the business, the Shecky Greenes, Milton Berles and George Burns. In those days, comedy and Judaism kind of went hand in hand," Eugene said.

In the Schitt's Creek world, Johnny Rose (Eugene Levy) is Jewish. His wife, former soap-star Moira (Catherine O'Hara, also formerly of SCTV) is not. Their young adult kids, hipster David (Dan Levy), and socialite Alexis (Annie Murphy), are a bit of a mix, and family means everything to them.

The idea of a town called Schitt's Creek was born over a few drinks at a dinner party.

"This little dinner table conversation joke actually seemed to fit very nicely because it so accurately described the situation that this family finds themselves in," Eugene said.

"This is a very pampered, spoiled, wealthy family. The cast that we have has really done such a great job getting inside these characters and finding that kind of vulnerable spot that the TV audience can latch onto," he said.

The Rose family were millionaires, but have lost their fortune. Forced to give up their mansion, they must relocate to their last remaining asset: a small, dreary town called Schitt's Creek, which Johnny once bought as a joke. Stuck living in a rundown motel in that town, the family must now discover what it means to be poor and still be a family.

"We have seen the riches-to-rags premise played out on mainstream network television, but never through a more specific comedic lens," Dan said.

"The challenge was to create these blindly unaware people who are not like any wealthy caricatures we have seen before on television. When Catherine [O'Hara] came on board, she brought such a unique voice to her character. We cast Annie Murphy in the character of Alexis – we have seen the spoiled socialite so many times – but what Annie brought to that character was such a lovability that you feel for her despite everything," Dan said.

Dan Levy and Eugene Levy

The first season of Schitt's Creek premiered in January attracting an impressive 1.36 million viewers. The season finale aired on March 31.

"When we were writing Season 1, we would talk about family – family dynamics and family relationships, and how a family acts with each other behind closed doors versus out in public," Dan said. "They can banter and bicker without putting on the niceties of being in public, and we just started sharing stories.

"Me, my dad and all of our writers started to share funny stories that have happened to us as family members. I think that has really helped authenticate the family dynamic in the show, because you immediately get the sense that these people are family. We were able to capture that intimacy."

What was it like working alongside comedy gold?

"You always hope that the interpersonal relationships only help enhance professionally, and I think what we've done is really found a sweet spot where we can benefit from each other's different ideas, and – obviously in my case – from my dad's experience. It's been lovely," Dan said.

Schitt's Creek has been renewed for a second season and starts shooting again on April 14. Dan said viewers should expect some differences.

"Relationships have shifted a little. The family dynamic is slightly different now that they know they are going to be in the town for a little longer than they had hoped. I think you start to see the Roses beginning to live a day-to-day life in the town, which is a hilarious thing to watch." ■

Award-winning Israeli Holocaust book now in English

Escape in Time
Ronit Lowenstein-Malz
MB Publishing

Guelph artist Laurie McGaw poses at her studio with Elliana Kleiner, 14, who modelled for young Miri, the main character in the book Escape in Time.

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A Hebrew-language book that won Yad Vashem's prize for outstanding children's Holocaust literature in 2008 is being published in English this month, in conjunction with Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day).

Escape in Time – known in Hebrew as Nes Shel Ahava (A Miracle of Love) is Ronit Lowenstein-Malz's moving young adult novel based on her late mother's story of survival in Hungary during the Holocaust. The book is based on written memoirs.

Lowenstein-Malz, who has written nine books, worked as an educator for more than 20 years.

The author's mother, Miri, the main character in the novel, was a young girl when she and her parents, Naftuli and Hendi Eneman, and Miri's three older sisters left their hometown of Munkács within a short time of each other, and survived much of the war in Budapest. Naftuli's prescience, combined with repeated cases of luck, instinct, courage and resourcefulness, helped them to narrowly escape a dire fate.

In the book, Miri's story alternates with that of her granddaughter Nessya, a girl consumed with curiosity about the past when she learns that her grandmother is a survivor.

The book's American publisher Bethesda-based Margie Blumberg of MB Publishing – fell in love with the book when Ruth Lieberman, the author's cousin, sent her an unsolicited synopsis.

To illustrate the English version, Blumberg turned to award-winning Guelph, Ont., artist Laurie McGaw, who had illustrated Blumberg's 2003 children's book Avram's Gift. Blumberg, who founded her company 12 years ago, has published both fiction and non-fiction for children and young adults.

McGaw found models for her illustrations through Guelph's Beth Isaiah Synagogue and friends in the Guelph Jewish community, as well as Torontonians who had modelled for characters in Avram's Gift. On April 17, at 3:30 p.m., McGaw will speak at the Guelph Public Library about how she illustrated Escape in Time, and will also touch on information about Munkács and World War II.

Working on the "very meaningful manuscript" was a fantastic experience, she said at a launch party she hosted for the models and their families.

Blumberg said Escape in Time is "an important story that we felt we needed to be a part of, and we're honoured to be a part of."

Lieberman, whose mother was a sister to Miri, was taken with "the quality of the writing and compellingness of the story" when she read it in the original Hebrew. She felt strongly that the book would have international appeal.

A research scientist who lives in Boulder, Colo., Lieberman enlisted help from translator Leora Frankel, and "lucked into" an agent who sent the English version to more than 20 publishers. They all "seemed to absolutely love it," but declined to publish it, Lieberman said. Undeterred, she continued the search on her own, contacting 10 more companies.

After championing the book for years, Lieberman said, "I'm really thrilled that my mother's family story is hopefully going to be part of the middle school Holocaust education or reading canon. I think it's very inspiring. I think that they were amazing people who just had to make really tough decisions, and I think that they were really brave."

As of early April, Lieberman had two events scheduled for this month, a reading at a local middle school, and a discussion with bar and bat mitzvah students.

Miri's real-life close friend, Malka Marom – part of the singing duo Malka and Joso in the 1960s – remembers Miri and her family as very brave, very wise, and good storytellers. Lowenstein-Malz, who uses Marom's name in one scene in the English version, inherited their storytelling ability, Marom said.

Lowenstein-Malz told The CJN in an email that as a child, she felt embarrassed by her mother, a Holocaust survivor with no number on her arm, who hadn't been in a concentration camp, and was "even beautiful and radiant.

"But she always managed to survive the horrors of the Holocaust, to escape in time. I then understood that this story that I was so ashamed of during my childhood, is a story I want to tell to the generations to come. Through this story, one can understand what happened in the Holocaust without being too scared." ■

Orphan Black villain excited about Season 3

sshefa@thecjn.ca

In his most challenging and rewarding role to date, Orphan Black's Ari Millen said the next season of the Canadian science fiction show will keep viewers guessing.

Having played the role of Mark Rollins, a religious assassin who was tasked with murdering female clones of Project Leda, the second season finale revealed that his character is a male clone, created as part of Project Castor.

"Moving forward, I think the season premier picks up minutes later from that, and we will continue to explore the plotline of what is Project Castor, how are they involved in the overall mystery with Project Leda and the rest of the conspiracy," said Millen, a 33-year-old Kingston native.

Orphan Black, which stars Tatiana Maslany as Sarah Manning, is about a woman who assumes the identity of one of her clones after witnessing the suicide of one of them.

She learns that she is a clone, one of many living throughout North America and Europe, and that someone is plotting to kill her and the others.

The series, which will begin airing its third season on April 18, raises issues about the moral and ethical implications of human cloning.

"I guess the biggest thing is the theme of family and the importance of family, and in this season more than ever, it will become more important," said Millen, who now plays four roles as Project Castor clones Mark, Rudy, Seth and Miller.

"The Castor boys are going to be gunning hard for Sarah and the Leda family and making life difficult for them."

In an interview with The CJN, Millen, who grew up as a member of Kingston's Jewish community, said landing a regular gig on an award-winning Toronto-based TV show is a dream – one he's been working toward since he was a teenager.

"Like a lot of kids in Canada, I grew up being athletic, and hockey was a big part of my life and I wanted to be in the NHL. But if you're not in the junior system by 15 or 16, it's probably not going to happen for you. That's when I started shifting gears and tried to figure out what I wanted to do," he said.

"Acting was something I had always kind of done. Fooling around with my friends' video camera or school plays, but I guess when it came to the time to go to university, I thought, what am I going to do?"

He applied to the theatre acting program at Ryerson University, and has been landing roles since he graduated from the program in 2007.

Ari Millen plays a clone in Orphan Black

One of his first roles was a part in an episode of the television series ReGenesis, and he later won small roles in other TV shows including Nikita and Rookie Blue.

But his role on Orphan Black, which airs on Space in Canada and BBC America in the United States, has been the most challenging.

"This has probably been the most difficult thing I've ever done and the most rewarding, and certainly, going to set every day is always exciting. It was a great season and I'm very excited for everyone to see it," he said.

He said he's grateful he's able to "tell stories I'm proud of and to be able to provide for my family while doing what I want to be doing. That is the ultimate success as far as I'm concerned," said Millen, who is expecting his first child with his fiancée later this year.

"But it's a tough business, and it's hard to make a living. It wasn't until this year, this season specifically, that I was able to only do acting to pay my bills."

As for other roles, Millen can also be seen in a Canadian independent film called Hunter's Moon, which he described as "a werewolf movie meets Scooby Doo." ■

A lush portrait of a president and Jewish Americans

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The "friend of the Jews" is a familiar figure in popular Jewish commentary on mainstream culture. Non-Jewish friends are presented as models, both for their own sake and in contrast with those who oppose Jewish attainment or influence. American presidents are singled out for special status (in some cases without warrant) based upon the dramatic influence they wield in relation to events that either threaten or favour Jews.

Harry Truman's "friend" status was cemented by his early willingness to support the declaration of the State of Israel. Franklin Delano Roosevelt – beloved by Jews in the 1930s for his social policies and personal polish – proved, with scrutiny, to have failed in his wartime efforts to respond to the German onslaught on European Jews.

Abraham Lincoln is treated within this context in Lincoln and the Jews: A History, which is largely the work of Benjamin Shapell, founder of the California-based Shapell Manuscript archives, whose strengths are Americana and documents associated with 19th- and 20th-century Jewish history.

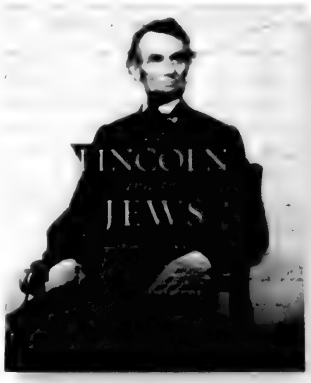
The 150th anniversary of Lincoln's assassination is in the wings, and this milestone has motivated a variety of Lincoln-related projects, including an exhibition mounted at the New-York Historical Society, set to travel to Lincoln's home in Springfield, Ill., and then to California.

The narrative offered in Lincoln and the Jews includes the broader movements of mid-19th-century America, a crucial time in the nation's history, encompassing civil war and the abolition of slavery. The Jewish story in America at this time is by no means momentous, but it is in itself of interest.

Lincoln's upbringing in Illinois and his rise to the presidency placed him in the vicinity – both intimate and casual – of Jews of varied stripes. Among these were clothiers in small Illinois towns, masons, resourceful retailers who became sutlers supplying Union soldiers, and substantial political figures like the first Jewish congressman and governor from Pennsylvania and Louisiana. Some of these men were pro-abolition, while others were pro-slavery (certain influential rabbis also spoke out in favour of slavery).

The relationship that proves most mysterious – presented in the weakest chapter of the book – is Lincoln's friendship with a Washington-based Jewish chiropodist named Issachar Zacharie. Known otherwise as Isachar, Issacher, Issachor, Zacharie, Zacharia and Zachariah, the foot doctor may have been a quack, and he may have served as a Union agitator in the south, but according to Lincoln, he treated the president's foot and back ailments "with[out] producing the slightest pain."

The value of Lincoln and the Jews lies in its reproduction of Lincolniana of every imaginable kind. The documents reproduced in lavish colour convey America in the mid-19th century; Lincoln's career; the lives of Jews in American towns and cities as well as in the military; and modes of correspondence, business transaction and portraiture of the era. The Shapell Lincoln collection includes many handwritten letters headed "Executive Mansion" – calling cards, texts of speeches and government proclamations.



Lincoln and the Jews: A History
by Jonathan Sarna and Benjamin Shapell
St. Martin's Press

> The value of [the book] lies in its reproduction of Lincolniana of every imaginable kind.

The notable fact regarding Jews depicted in these documents – beyond their social and economic status in America – is their German background. Their European upbringing often included substantial education and sophistication developed in Prussia's economic and cultural mainstream.

Jews in Lincoln's America were part of an early wave of European immigration to North America, which would be swamped in four decades by the arrival of hundreds of thousands of eastern European Jews leaving the collapsing Russian Empire.

One senses an element of earnest overreach in the repeated lesson offered by Lincoln and the Jews, as it stresses presidential interaction and favour for Lincoln's Jewish constituents. In its epilogue, we are reminded that he "interacted with Jews, represented Jews, befriended Jews, admired Jews, commissioned Jews, trusted Jews, defended Jews."

But one can't argue with the proposition that Lincoln's idiosyncratic relationship with Christianity, his numerous opportunities to meet and know Jews, and his major project – the emancipation of the American slaves – predisposed him to thoughtful attitude and action with regard to a major European-born minority whose history was rooted in the Bible.

At Lincoln's death, Jews numbered about 150,000 in America. He could not have imagined how this ethnic group would be transformed in number and status by the early years of the next century. ■

Jazz singer debuts her second album, P.S. I Love You

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Though she had been performing for many years, Monica Chapman came to jazz later in life, making it something of a second career for the Romanian-born, Toronto- and Guelph-based jazz vocalist.

This month, Chapman released her second jazz album, P.S. I Love You, a compilation of jazz and show tune standards by greats like Irving Berlin, Oscar Hammerstein and Lionel Bart that she's infused with a distinctly bluesy, New Orleans style.

Chapman's Toronto CD release show, in which she will be accompanied by full band, will be held April 24 at the downtown club Lula Lounge.

Produced and arranged by jazz musician and agent Bill King, P.S. I Love You features trumpet player William Sperandei, bassist Dave Young, Juno Award-winning jazz guitarist Nathan Hiltz and drummer Mark Kelso, as well as King himself on piano.

Having already had air time on CBC radio and Jazz FM, P.S. I Love You is more varied than Chapman's debut jazz album, But Beautiful, released on iTunes in 2013, which, also featuring covers, is more grounded in bluesy ballads from singers including Lena Horne and Billie Holiday.

Chapman, who moved with her family from Romania to Israel at the age of three and to Canada at nine, took voice lessons at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto as a teenager, as well as studying piano and clarinet.

Initially drawn to classical music and musical theatre, she played clarinet in the Scarborough Youth Symphony while in high school, majored in piano and voice at the University of Western Ontario and obtained an Associate of The Royal Conservatory (ARCT) diploma.

In her 20s, Chapman got involved in musical theatre and, after marrying and becoming the mother of two, she was accepted as a singer in the Toronto Operetta Theatre.

Only in the past decade, Chapman said, with the encouragement of her husband, who felt her voice was "well-suited to jazz," did she begin to make the transition from classical and musical theatre to jazz.

"I'm versatile and I love to combine different styles," she said. "It can be difficult to make the transition from classical into jazz, but it wasn't a problem for me. I'm very grateful to people like Bill King, who helped me along the way to find my jazz voice and further my jazz education, introducing me to singers like Billie Holiday, etc. I really just got hooked."

Among her key musical influences, she listed Judy Garland, Doris Day, Nina Simone and Frank Sinatra.

Splitting her time between Guelph, where she lives with her husband, and Toronto, Chapman teaches piano and singing to adults and kids from her private home studio and, in addition to recording, loves singing at jazz clubs.

She described singing at the New York City jazz club Birdland as "the highlight of my career." She has also sung at New York's The Salon and Toronto clubs The Reservoir Lounge and Lula Lounge.

"I love the intimacy of singing in clubs," she said. "I'm always looking for new places to sing and am looking into breaking into Montreal's jazz club scene."

This July, Chapman will perform at Toronto's East end Relish Bar & Grill as part of a jazz trio in the TD Toronto Jazz Festival.

P.S. I Love You is available for purchase on iTunes and at CD Baby, Amazon and various music stores around Toronto. ■

Doors for the April 24 CD release show open at 6:30 p.m., show starts at 7:30 p.m. No cover charge before 8 p.m. Reservations recommended.

San Francisco has heart

NANCY WIGSTON

On a sunny morning in Union Square, tourists are posing for selfies in front of a heart-shaped sculpture, in homage to singer Tony Bennett's 1962 mega-hit about leaving his heart in "my city by the bay." Surprisingly, Bennett himself painted this example – one of many dotting the city. Who knew he painted? Still, there's so much to discover in this city of hills, bridges and spectacular views that Bennett's artistic talent may be the least of it.

Just getting to our hotel from the airport was an adventure. "You live up there?" asked our disbelieving cabbie. The young couple in our shared taxi-van affirmed that yes, they did. We peered out: the incline was about 75 degrees. Plunging the vehicle into reverse, the driver performed a sort of running jump that landed us quite near their door. Eventually we would see the world's most crooked street (Lombard) and the much-photographed Victorian "painted ladies" of Alamo Square, but nothing topped this introduction to the vertical city.

At Union Square, we join the queue for a Green Line Hop-On-Hop-Off Bus to far-flung Golden Gate Park and all points in between. Braving top-deck breezes with fellow travellers from Holland, England and assorted American states, we're entertained for the next 90 minutes by our amiable driver's spiel, punctuated with tapes of city-connected hit songs, like the crowd-pleasing, Dock of the Bay.

Driving through the Tenderloin District, we learn that these streets, once famous for speakeasies, crime and "houses of negotiated affection," only attracted policemen to keep things under control when the cops were bribed with gifts from local butchers – expensive "tenderloin" cuts of meat – in return for their presence.

We pass Glide Memorial Church, since the 1960s, a generous provider of dinner meals to thousands of needy citizens. Actor Will Smith, playing a homeless man, lined up with the rest in 2006's The Pursuit of Happyness. We remember that Canada's own Rabbi Abraham Fineberg worked with Glide in his later years – after he'd sung along with John Lennon in Montreal, recording Give Peace a Chance.

Next stop – for a photo-op – is the city's gorgeously domed City Hall, built for the 1915 Pacific Exposition. Joe DiMaggio and Marilyn Monroe tied the knot here in 1954, later posing for wedding photos in his North Beach neighbourhood, renowned for Italian restaurants, espresso cafés and City Lights Bookstore, home of the Beat Poets.

San Francisco often seems familiar: we recognize the house where the movie Mrs. Doubtfire was filmed, drive by more lovely "painted ladies," as well as a music auditorium named for rock impresario Bill Graham. Soon, the urban landscape gives way to trees and parks, until we stop for a break at Land's End, to stretch our wings, so to speak.

Our spirits are lifted by the immensity of the scene before us: the Pacific Ocean's rolling blue-and-white surf, the vast skies and unseen but powerful rip tides ("They'll take you to Japan") and the great white sharks circling beneath the waves.

On board once more, we head north to our final destination: Golden Gate Park.

> There's so much to discover in this city of hills, bridges, and spectacular views

An astonishing 412 hectares, the park was created under the supervision of Scotsman John McLaren, Central Park designer Frederick Law Olmstead having quit the project, fearing failure. McLaren's 53 years of devotion made Golden Gate into one of the most popular parks in the United States.

Here we discover America's oldest Japanese tea garden, a flower conservatory, an aquarium, lakes, polo fields, a windmill – even a bison paddock. Golden Gate also boasts two museums, the De Young (Fine Arts) and the California Academy of Science, the world's "greenest museum." Some among us disembark to explore further; the bus will return in two hours.

Seeing the park, even by bus, is a revelation. In the words of our driver/guide: "You will leave even more beautiful than when you came in – trust me, I come here on my days off and work on my self-esteem issues."

We laugh, but Golden Gate Park, together with Land's End, epitomizes all things Californian: surfers, hikers, cyclists, art, science – and a world of natural wonders.

The drive back takes us through now-touristy Haight-Ashbury. Noting the white-pillared mansion where Bill Graham housed The Jefferson Airplane and Jimi Hendrix's former digs, we regard these testaments to the Summer of Love somewhat coolly – the fact is, our top-tier bus seats have grown chilly.

"New Jersey's leaving the building!" sings out a departing group from the Garden State, and soon, so are we.

Back downtown, we pass cable cars and long queues of tourists as we head toward the grand sweep of San Francisco Bay and the other Golden Gate, the bridge. On the way, another surprise: at 736 Mission St., we find The Contemporary Jewish Museum, its spiky modern wing instantly recognizable as the work of Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum "crystal" architect Daniel Liebeskind.

Featuring a grand atrium, an education centre, a terrific café and a shop, the museum is not a permanent-collection kind of place. Featuring travelling exhibits, it shimmers with light and life, from its 32 diamond-like windows to its exterior blue steel shell with luminous panels that change colour, according to time of day, season or perspective.

Inspired by the site – it's attached to the red-brick Pacific Gas & Electric Power Substation, where energy was first restored to the earthquake-devastated city in 1906 – Liebeskind designed a building that sparkles with energy. Its sole long-term exhibit, Hardly Strictly Warren Hellman (until October 2016) focuses on the life and legacy of financier, philanthropist and banjo player Warren Hellman, a uniquely Jewish, uniquely San Francisco figure.

Described by a city newspaper as "a Republican who supported labour unions, an investment banker whose greatest joy was playing songs of the working class in a bluegrass band," in 2001, Hellman founded the Hardly Strictly Bluegrass Festival, a free event held in Golden Gate Park's Speedway Meadows (now Hellman Hollow). The festival draws 700,000 fans to his beloved park each October.

This quirky musical exhibit features a small stage, videos of Hellman playing with fellow musicians (check the museum website, www.theCJM.org, for performances), scrapbooks, Hellman's Star of David rhinestone jacket and his banjo, among other ephemera. We leave this airy museum feeling that we've known, even briefly, a man who embodied the spirit of his city, a man with a heart. ■

Eclectic lineup in store at Segal next season

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca MONTREAL

Montreal's Segal Centre for Performing Arts has again chosen a big, splashy musical to open its main-stage theatre season.

An all-new production of Funny Girl, with Gabi Epstein of Toronto in the role of the sassy Fanny Brice, debuts Oct. 11-Nov. 1 under the direction of Shaw Festival veteran Peter Hinton.

Heading the cast of 18 in this revival and playing at the Segal for the first time is a thrill, Epstein said in a videotaped message from Toronto where she is performing in the musical Once at the Ed Mirvish Theatre.

All seven of the plays in 2015-2016 are Montreal premieres, Segal executive and artistic director Lisa Rubin announced at the season's unveiling.

The witty Tribes (Nov. 29-Dec. 20) by the British Nina Raine, described by Rubin as "one of the most talked about new plays in North America" is about a young man who is the only deaf member of his intellectual family. Montreal actor Jack Volpe, who has been hearing impaired since birth, will make his professional stage debut as the lead character, who learns how to find his own way in the world.

The press conference for the season launch was signed throughout, and during the play's run, related activities like the Sunday-@-the-Segal talk will be interpreted in American Sign Language and Langue des signes québécoises.

To begin 2016 is The Secret Annex (Jan. 31-Feb. 21) by Winnipeger Alix Sobler, which imagines an Anne Frank who survived the Holocaust and is now 25 and living in New York. Still idealistic, she is trying to get her diary published and also dealing with family and romantic entanglements. It's presented in partnership with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Another young Canadian actress, Sara Farb, plays the lead role. Farb is now rehearsing the role of the traditional Anne Frank in the Stratford Festival's The Diary of Anne Frank. The next two mainstage plays are produced with Copa de Oro Productions, with whom the Segal has collaborated successfully in such musicals as Belles Soeurs and Forever Plaid.

The solo Boom: The Music, Culture and Events that Shaped a Generation, written, directed and performed by Gemini-and Dora awards-winner Rick Miller is a paean to the music of the baby boomers (March 20-April 10, 2016), while the off-Broadway I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change is a musical comedy, a Tony Award winner for Joe DiPietro about the ups and downs of romantic relationships at any age (May 8-29, 2016). It will be directed by Wade Lynch, who is directing Anne of Green Gables at the Charlottetown Festival this summer. He recently moved to Montreal.

In between, on the Segal second stage, the Studio, is Joshua Harmon's Bad Jews (May 1-22, 2016) which will see Lisa Rubin make her directorial debut.

"This is about family, faith and legacy; it's thought-provoking, poignant and funny," she said, "and raises questions I have asked myself many times."

Three cousins gather to mourn the death of their beloved grandfather, and then fight over a precious family heirloom, revealing cracks in their family ties.

The Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre (DWYT) play (June 19-July 10, 2016) is a world premiere, based on another classic: an adaptation of the Mel Brooks musical The Producers.

For the first time, the DWYT is working in association with the talented amateur Côte St. Luc Dramatic Society and the show will be directed by its founding artistic director Anisa Cameron, who also heads Bialik High School's theatre program.

Former DWYT director Bryna Wasserman, now executive director of New York's Folksbiene Yiddish theatre, is artistic consultant.

Rubin said the Segal is trying to get Brooks to attend this production rendered in the language in which he grew up.

The Segal also views as an important part of its mission the nurturing of local small theatrical companies. Through 2015-2016, its Studio will be the scene of productions by Teesri Duniya, Tableau d'Hôte Theatre, Youtheatre, and the French-language Les Productions Pas de Panique.

The Segal also unveiled a six-concert jazz series opening in October with the six-time Grammy-nominated singer Tierney Sutton. This will be the eighth season of jazz at the centre.

New this season are screenings of Shakespearean plays from London's Globe Theatre in its 77-seat CinemaSpace, with pre-show discussions hosted by Repercussion Theatre, which performs Shakespeare outdoors in the summer. ■

Roy Salomon first Canadian honoured by Maccabi USA

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, BOCA RATON

Although former Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon has been recognized numerous times in his own country, he became the first Canadian citizen to be honoured by Maccabi USA in a recent ceremony here for his 46-year involvement with Maccabi Canada and the World Maccabi Union.

Salomon was cited along with 14 other outstanding Jewish athletes, organizers and volunteers at the Legends of the Maccabiah Gala Brunch.

Salomon represents part of the rich history and tradition of excellence of Canadian Jewish athletes and organizers at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Held every four years following an Olympics year, the Maccabiah Games is considered the third largest sports movement in the world, behind only the Olympics and Pan American Games.

Maccabi USA presented Salomon with the Maccabi Spirit Award for being one of the few people in Canada to have contributed to the Maccabi organization on the local, national and international levels.

"From the moment I represented Canada in basketball at the 1969 Maccabiah Games, I felt moved to be with the Maccabiah Games for a lifetime. The thrill of hearing and seeing 60,000 spectators cheer all the athletes at the opening ceremonies is a thrill I will never forget," said Salomon, 78, at the tribute where the other honorees were Americans.

Salomon moved to Montreal from Brooklyn in 1960 to form a real estate development company that established the Cavendish Mall in Côte St. Luc, among other commercial properties.

A past president of Maccabi Canada for eight terms from 1993-2001, Salomon always was close to the many athletes he recruited to the Maccabiah Games for decades.

He is credited with pushing for the addition of junior athletes (14 and under) with athletic competitions in separate categories. The first juniors competed at the Maccabiah Games in 1985.

"The popularity of junior athletes has grown so much that they represent close to a third of the athletes that go to the Maccabiah Games," he said. "Many of the junior athletes, moved by the trip and competition in Israel, often return to the Games in the open category and fare well because of their experiences at the junior level."

Roy Salomon

Salomon was a key player on the international level at the Maccabi World Union for mediating relations between Australia, four of whose Maccabiah team members were killed as a result of the 1997 bridge collapse at the Games' opening, and Israel.

"Australia continued to fund teams for the Games and we have paid tribute to their athletes since the accident," he said.

Salomon also is credited with raising the profile of Maccabi Canada by inviting hockey great Jean Béliveau to serve as the Canadian team's chef de mission at the 1985 and 1997 Games.

The 1997 Games was another milestone for Salomon as the Canadian hockey team won gold under the tutelage of coach Jacques Demers.

"It really was the Maccabi Canada organization and not me that was responsible for both Jacques [Demers] and Jean [Béliveau] being involved with the Maccabiah Games," he said with characteristic modesty.

Along with Maccabi USA president Bob Spivack, Salomon was the honorary co-chair at the last Maccabiah Games in 2013.

He also founded the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame originally at the Davis YM-YWHA in 1979 and was honoured at the 2013 Sports Celebrity Breakfast, benefiting the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors Foundation.

Among the others feted at the brunch were: former 1956 Wimbledon doubles tennis champion Angela Buxton, former professional golfer Bruce Fleisher, (who competed at the Canadian Open golf championship many times), and former National Basketball Association player Danny Schayes, who played against the Toronto Raptors before his retirement in 1999. ■

Happy to skip the Eshet Chayil

Lauren Kramer

At my friend's Shabbat dinner table a few weeks ago, her husband broke into a solo version of Eshet Chayil (Woman of Valour, Proverbs, Chapter 31). Not sure where to look, I kept my eyes downcast, sharing a conspiratorial smile with my spouse.

I don't recall ever having been serenaded, but were I able to choose, Eshet Chayil wouldn't be my first choice of song. This is a proverb that gets my back up each time I hear it. It's the nuances of the song that bother me, or rather, its direct translation. Eshet Chayil just makes no sense to me. It paints the portrait of a woman who does not exist, who possibly never has. The woman described in Eshet Chayil is a selfless slave. One hand on the distaff, the other on the spindle, the tasks she performs are utterly outdated and have no meaning in the context of our present day reality.

What's more, they border on the ridiculous. Our Eshet Chayil plants a vineyard and rations her maids. Since when is maid rationing an action to be lauded? She buys a field, makes and sells her own clothes and "girds her loins," roughly translated as preparing herself for a task requiring endurance. That task can only be the lifestyle described in the song.

Our Eshet Chayil is never allowed to rest. Instead she must make her own bedspreads, deliver a belt to the pedlar and clothe her family. While her husband can sit with the elders (the emphatic word here being "sit"), the woman this proverb describes may never "eat the bread of idleness" or spend time and effort on making herself feel beautiful. Nope, that would be vain, and anyway, she has too much to do between anticipating household needs, decking herself out in purple wool and linen, helping the poor and destitute and burning the midnight oil. Even sleep she denies herself.

> Eshet Chayil feels prehistoric and by today's standards, simply absurd

So here are my questions – Why do we sing about this phantom woman? How does this song celebrate modern couples today and their distribution of labour, and if it doesn't, why are folks still singing it?

Rabbinical scholars argue that it's not to be taken literally, that the Eshet Chayil represents the feminine presence of God. Others argue that its meaning must be taken in context of the Masoretic text, the traditional Hebrew text of the Jewish Bible, preceded by instructions the mother of King Lemuel gives to her son. Maybe the proverb was Lemuel's eulogy to his mother. Still, that doesn't help me understand why it's sung at contemporary Shabbat tables and what meaning it holds for today's Jewish women.

Praise I'm okay with. I think women get way less of that than they deserve. And particularly on a Friday night, before the family feasts on a three-course dinner, a little praise is a good thing. But the words of praise are just as important as the praise itself and Eshet Chayil feels prehistoric and by today's standards, simply absurd.

So there'll be no renditions of Eshet Chayil at my table. You'll say I'm too literal, but I believe the woman of valour described in this proverb doesn't describe me or anyone else I know, nor does it present a realistic set of goals for anyone to aspire to. Until a more meaningful Shabbat song is composed to describe a contemporary woman of valour, I'm quite comfortable to go un-serenaded.

Even if that means forfeiting praise completely. ■

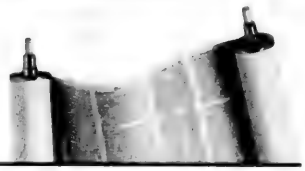
Shmini | Leviticus 9:1 - 11:47



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains why celebration and despair go hand in hand
Rabbi Denise Handlarski focuses on the distinction between sacred and secular
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says we may not understand God's ways, but we can still be united

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

Shmini is an emotional roller-coaster, with the joyous dedication of the Tabernacle and the tragic death of Aaron's sons presented side by side. There's a powerful lesson found in the Torah's presenting of these two episodes in such close proximity to one another.

The celebration of the Tabernacle's dedication follows extensive preparation and investment of time and money. Everything unfolds according to plan: the leaders, Moses and Aaron, bless the people, and God's presence is seen in the fire. What a great feeling of satisfaction!

However, the divine fire that expresses God's presence also kills Nadav and Avihu, the sons of Aaron. Personally, I'm uncomfortable justifying God's actions here or placing wrongdoing upon the boys that is worthy of death. This tragedy, though, reflects the tragic and unexplainable losses – losses that we know too well, such as those that occurred in Israel, Paris, and Brooklyn, all in the past months.

By combining these moments of great expectation and joy with the feelings of despair on the same day, the Torah is telling us that they do not conflict with each other. At great moments, such as a Jewish wedding, we celebrate by breaking a glass, symbolizing the brokenness and celebration that go hand in hand.

Finally, the last part of the parshah focuses on the details of kosher animals. At first sight, this seems like a strange place to put these details after such profound and intense feelings of joy and sadness. However, these laws present an important conclusion, teaching us to elevate the mundane and the physical.

Our lives will hopefully have many moments of satisfaction and blessing. Likely, we will unfortunately encounter setbacks along the way. Our everyday choices, like what we eat, are very much under our control. They are opportunities to elevate our daily lives and empower us to navigate the highs and lows, over which we would otherwise have little control. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Shmini means "eighth." In this parshah, it refers to the eighth day of the Tabernacle. There were seven days of training during which the Tabernacle was erected and taken down each night. On the eighth day, the practice was to end and the Temple to stand.

Thus, in many ways, the eighth day was really the first day. In Shmini, Aaron is told that the job of the priests is to "distinguish between the sacred and the profane."

We ourselves have a weekly way of distinguishing between these if we mark Shabbat. Shabbat is a special, sacred time when we remember to rest, to breathe. At the close of Shabbat, we celebrate Havdalah, meaning separation. It is time to mark the transition between the sacred time of Shabbat and the ordinary time of the week.

Some see Havdalah as more of a joining than a separation – we bring the sacredness into the rest of the week by beginning the week with the lovely rituals of lighting interwoven candles, singing songs and smelling spices.

This week, maybe seven won't be our lucky number. Instead, let's focus on eight. On this day after the cycle of the week, we can reflect on what is extraordinary about our ordinary weeks and lives. Let's think of the eighth day as a first day, a new beginning.

There must be a division between the sacred and the everyday for us to be able to distinguish between them. But there is also room to bring a little more of what is sacred to us, and what is highest in our consciousness and heart, into our daily practices.

Shmini asks us to contemplate both the separation and the joining. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

In the period between Passover and Shavuot, a tragedy happened many years ago. Thousands of the greatest students of Rabbi Akiva died. Why? Because they did not have enough respect for each other.

These were some of the greatest rabbis who ever lived. Yet, on their level of greatness, they should have had more respect for each other.

So during this period, to mourn for them, we don't get married, we don't get haircuts and we try not to listen to entertaining music.

We all can think of ways to improve. Let's have more respect for our spouses and more tolerance for each other, even though we may have different opinions.

I enjoyed the seder we just had on Pesach, because there were so many kinds of Jews there – some less observant (for the time being) and some more observant. But we were all at the seder, respectful of each other. Surely God is joyful when he sees us in unity with each other.

This is why God gave us the Torah on Shavuot, which we're now preparing for: because he saw we were united.

The Jewish community in New York recently experienced a tragedy in which a loving father lost seven of his precious children. Who was not touched by this?

Until the Mashiach comes, we will never understand God's ways. But we do know that when we have peace in our communities, this brings blessings, as the prayer Sim Shalom Tova Uvracha tells us.

The Lubavitcher Rebbe told us that "One action we do is greater than a thousand sighs." We all shed a tear. But now what? Do our tears benefit anyone?

Let's resolve to be more united and do more mitzvot, and surely God will bring true peace, with Mashiach in our days. ■

Food processor makes homemade easier

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The word homemade can bring a great sense of pride to a baker, but lack of time or interest often makes baking from scratch out of the question.

Enter the food processor. It puts homemade into the realm of possibility for many. There are so many recipes where you simply add all the ingredients into your food processor, process for less than a minute, pour the mixture into a pan and bake. Viola! Delicious homemade cake.

One thing to remember when making cake batter in a food processor, however, is to not overdo it. Just process the batter until all the ingredients are incorporated. Overprocessing can result in dense, heavy cakes. Also cakes that rely on beaten-in air bubbles such as chiffon cake don't do well when made in a food processor. The machine cannot whip enough air into the batter.

Here are some recipes that work very well in the food processor.

Mud Cake

This is quick and simple to make, and everyone loves it. Every time it's put out, it's gone in a flash. This recipe is for a 9x9-inch pan, but I always double it and make it in a 9x13-inch pan.

- 1 1/2 cups flour
- 1 cup sugar
- 1 tsp. baking soda
- 1 tsp. salt
- 3 tbsp. cocoa
- 5 tbsp. oil
- 1 tbsp. vinegar
- 1 tsp. vanilla
- 1 cup water
- 1/4-1/3 cup nuts

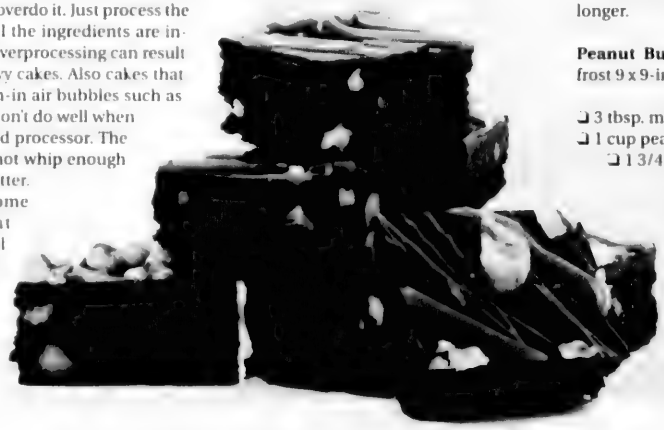
Mix all the ingredients together in food processor just until incorporated. Pour into 9 x 9-in. greased pan and bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Cool and frost with Peanut Butter Frosting. Makes 12 servings.

Note: If you double this recipe, it will need to bake for about 10 minutes longer.

Peanut Butter Frosting (enough to frost 9 x 9-in. cake)

- 3 tbsp. margarine
- 1 cup peanut butter
- 1 3/4 cups powdered sugar

Melt margarine in a saucepan over low heat; add peanut butter and powdered sugar. Stir until melted and spread over cake. If you accidentally overcook this frosting, it will turn to fudge.



Basic White Cake

All the variations shown below demonstrate how versatile this delicious cake is.

- 1 cup margarine, room temperature
- 2 cups sugar
- 4 eggs
- 3 1/2 cups flour
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 4 tsp. baking powder
- 1 1/2 cups liquid (milk, water, pine apple juice, coconut milk, etc.)
- 2 tsp. vanilla or other extract

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour two 9-in. cake pans or one 9 x 13-in pan.

In a food processor bowl, cream margarine well. Add sugar and process well, then add eggs, one at a time, and vanilla and process until incorporated.

In a separate bowl, combine flour, salt and baking powder. Add dry ingredients to creamed mixture alternately with the liquid, processing just until ingredients are incorporated.

Pour into prepared pan and bake for 45-55 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into centre comes out clean and cake begins to pull away from sides.

Variations:

Apple Cake: Peel and thinly slice 3 apples. Combine 1 tsp. cinnamon with 3 tbsp. sugar and coat apples with mixture. Pour 2/3 of batter into pan, add a layer of apples, then pour remaining batter over apples.

Blueberry cake: Sprinkle top of batter with 2 cups washed and dried blueberries – they'll blend into the batter while baking. Don't mix blueberries into batter or they'll sink to the bottom.

Chocolate chip cake: Mix 1 cup chocolate chips into batter before pouring into pan.

Chocolate Marble cake: Melt 4 ounces of semisweet chocolate together with 2 tablespoons margarine. Once mixture has melted, combine with 2 tablespoons of cake batter, then drizzle across top of batter in pan and swirl lightly into rest of batter with a knife.

Coconut cake: Mix 1 cup shredded coconut into batter and sprinkle 1/2 cup on top of batter.

Genevieve Zubrzycki: Poland experiencing Jewish revival

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Genevieve Zubrzycki, associate professor of sociology, faculty associate at the Frankel Center for Judaic Studies at the University of Michigan and author of The Crosses of Auschwitz: Nationalism and Religion in Post-Communist Poland (University of Chicago Press, 2006), is working on a new book about the ongoing revival of Jewish communities in Poland and the interest non-Jewish Poles are taking in Jewish history and culture.

Last month, Zubrzycki was in Toronto and gave a talk at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre titled "Making sense of the Jewish revival in contemporary Poland." The event was hosted by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada and the Canadian Association of Warsaw's Museum of The History of Polish Jews.

The CJN spoke to Zubrzycki about Jewish revival and Jewish life in today's Poland.

Genevieve Zubrzycki says Poles' persecution of Jews wasn't discussed under Communist rule.

Will you describe Poland's Jewish revival and the lead-up to it.

Many Jews emigrated immediately after World War II. Others returned to their homes and later fell victim to pogroms. Others chose to remain in Poland. That was the case for many Jews who survived the war by going east and came back to build a socialist Poland. For that category, religion and ethnicity didn't matter; they were secular, and their Jewishness was secondary to other identities.

In 1968, there was a significant purge, and many of the Jews who had remained in or returned to Poland after the war were basically expelled from the People's Republic. Throughout that period, there were also Jews who had survived the war hidden, under false papers or adopted by Christian families – who either continued to hide their Jewishness for fear of discrimination or because they didn't know they were Jewish. (Many of them are now rediscovering their Jewish roots and embracing a Jewish identity.)

In the 1980s, during Communism, a small group of people involved in opposition to the Communist regime organized underground courses where people would read all kinds of censored texts, poetry, etc., and a branch of it was created as a sort of "Jewish flying university," where a small movement of people (mostly of Jewish origin, but also some non-Jews) tried to learn about Jewish history.

After the fall of Communism in Poland in 1989, this became more serious within the mainstream Jewish community. At that time, organizations started to fund Jewish activities in Poland and rabbis from Israel and the United States started coming to Poland. Several philanthropic organizations funded the Jewish revival – these include the Jewish Joint Committee, the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, the Taube Foundation and some that joined later, such as Shavei Israel.

How many Jews currently live in Poland?

According to a census taken two years ago, there are about 7,000 Jews – people who chose to identify themselves as Jewish in the census. We don't know "how Jewish" they are – for example, halachically, whether both parents are Jewish, one grandparent, if they converted, etc.

The number of Jews in Poland is much larger, however, if one looks at the number of people who maintain some formal ties to Jewish organizations, or the number of Poles who are thought to have one Jewish grandparent. This is why the range is so wide, from 7,000 to 40,000 Jews, depending on sources.

The number of Jews is growing. Many Poles are rediscovering their Jewish roots that were either hidden or ignored until recently, and now embracing their Jewishness and/or Judaism.

What is contemporary Jewish life in Poland like?

There's a very vibrant set of communities in Warsaw, Krakow and Wroclaw.

The community is very diverse. It used to be mostly Orthodox, but now there's also Reform Judaism, which emerged in Poland between five and 10 years ago. You have Chabad, which showed up in Poland after the fall of Communism.

To give you an idea of the range, one community in Krakow is led by a female rabbi.

There are Jewish community centres in Krakow and Warsaw that are primarily secular institutions open to Jews as well as non-Jews interested in all things related to Jewishness – Yiddish and Hebrew classes, yoga classes, cooking classes and Shabbat dinners every Friday.

In Krakow, visitors to the city to visit Auschwitz are invited to the dinners and can go meet Krakow Jews.

There are also about 40 festivals celebrating Jewish culture. Clearly, Jewish revival is a very popular phenomenon that goes way beyond the borders of the Jewish community.

Why are non-Jewish Poles interested in Jewish history and culture?

A number of things have converged to make all things Jewish really present in the public sphere. There's been a push from Poles in different political and social circles to expand Polish national identity beyond the Catholic Church and therefore embrace Jewishness and Jewish culture.

But it's also related to Holocaust tourism and people coming to Poland to visit the death camps and industries developing around that, an examination of ethnic Poles' role in the Holocaust and the opening of Poland to the West and the European Union.

A book published in 2001, called Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland, showed the participation of ethnic Poles in a pogrom in the Jedwabne village in Nazi-occupied Poland in 1941.

Poles' persecution of Jews during and after World War II was not talked about under Communism.

The book created a very public debate about the roles of Poles in the Holocaust and contributed to Poles wanting to understand more about their roles and about Jewish life before World War II.

Was this partly motivated by a sense of guilt on their part?

Not really. It's not as clear-cut in the Polish case as in the German case. Six million Polish citizens were killed during World War II, so the issue of guilt is very complicated.

Mostly it's about recovering a past that had been completely destroyed. The Museum of the History of Polish Jews that opened in Warsaw last October has been intended as a museum of life, believing that, to show the tragedy of the Holocaust, you need to understand the world it erased – an entire culture and civilization, villages, urban neighbourhoods, an entire way of life that has disappeared.

So the Jewish revival is also an attempt by non-Jewish Poles to recover the history eradicated by World War II and the memory erased by the Communist system.

Have you seen resistance to the Jewish revival in Poland stemming from anti-Semitism?

Obviously there is some anti-Semitism. You have right-wing groups in Poland for whom the Jew is the enemy. But most Jewish activists and rabbis I talk to say they feel more comfortable in Poland than places like Germany, Italy, France. I'm sure on the Internet you can see a lot of anti-Semitic comments, but there isn't a real pushback [to the Jewish revival].

The president of Poland is the official sponsor of the festival of Jewish culture in Krakow, the museum was funded with public money. The Polish state is endorsing a lot of the initiatives. ■

Walking on water

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Neville Chamberlain could have walked on water! Having betrayed the only democracy in Eastern Europe, Czechoslovakia, Chamberlain returned to England as the man who had saved the peace. "No conqueror returning from Victory on the battlefield," effused The Times, "has come adorned with nobler laurels."

As he emerged from his plane on Sept. 30, 1938, Chamberlain stopped and announced to delirious crowds that the resolution of the Czechoslovak problem was only a "prelude to a larger settlement in which all of Europe may find peace." He then waved the famous piece of paper and declared that he had signed an agreement with Hitler stating "the desire of our two peoples never to go to war with one another again."

Amidst laud renditions of "For he is a jolly good fellow," he was whisked to Buckingham Palace so that the monarch could express personally his "most heartfelt congratulations" on the success of his negotiations with Hitler. At the Palace's main balcony, the king and queen presented the prime minister to a roaring crowd as he basked in the adulation of the masses in the centre of a sphere illuminated by a giant searchlight. Festivities continued late into the night at 10 Downing St. Responding to the chants of the crowd, he appeared at an open window and declared that it was "Peace in our time."

In a little over two years after the tumultuous reception accorded to Chamberlain, his funeral was held at Westminster Abbey on Nov. 14, 1940. The congregants sat in frigid cold as the windows had been shattered by incendiary bombs rained down by the Luftwaffe. The Blitz was turning London into an inferno.

Ever magnanimous, Churchill, the new prime minster, who had foretold everything, delivered one of the most poignant funeral orations in history by praising his predecessor for his sincere quest for peace.

But how was it possible that in so short a time since Chamberlain's triumphal return from Germany, Britain found herself in the shadow of scaffolds, alone and friendless, facing the relentless Nazi juggernaut?

It happened because the appeasers imagined that they could work with a criminal regime to maintain the peace. It happened because they abandoned their friends preferring instead to work with genocidal dictators. It happened because they dismissed the anti-Semitism of the Third Reich as inconsequential in the greater scheme of their grand agenda. It happened because they remained silent and ignored, as William Manchester wrote in his biography of Churchill, The Last Lion, the Nazis' "frequent resort to murder and torture, submitted to extortion, humiliation, and abuse, having sold out all who had sought to stand shoulder to shoulder against the new barbarism."

It happened because they and the governing elites in both France and England refused to heed Churchill's warning that "Virtuous motives, trammeled by inertia and timidity, are no match for armed and resolute wickedness. A sincere love of peace is no excuse for muddling hundreds of millions of humble folk into total war. The cheers of the weak, well-meaning assemblies soon cease to count. Doom marches on."

And, indeed, "doom marched on" as more than 60 million souls followed Chamberlain into the grave.

It is perilous to propound any direct contemporary lessons from the events preceding World War II, not least because it is difficult to extrapolate from the past into the future where different circumstances prevail. But to the extent that there are historical patterns concerning the consequences of appeasing genocidal tyrants, in the misplaced hope that such propitiation would moderate their behaviour, there are lessons to be learned.

In that context, Chamberlain's policies illuminate the inherent risks in negotiating in good faith with those who are congenitally incapable of reciprocating in kind. While Chamberlain's approach to dealing with the Nazis produced a global conflagration, the current appeasement of Iran will most certainly engender a nuclear arms race in the most volatile region of the world.

The consequences are incalculable. ■

on Tuesday, March 31, 2015 at Baycrest Hospital

Barry, who lost his battle to cancer, fought until the last day with strength and dignity, just as he lived his life. Loving father of Gianna Kasman and father-in-law of Grant Brown. Devoted grandfather of Eden and Sasha. Sadly missed by Joscelyn Kasman. Dear son and brother of the late Philip ז"ל and Evelyn Kasman ז"ל and Sheldon Kasman ז"ל.

He was larger than life, and will never be forgotten by those lives he touched. Service was held at Beth Tzedec Memorial Park on Thursday, April 2, 2015. Shiva was concluded with the onset of Passover.

It is with deep sadness that the family announces the passing of Nouly Ariadini Howard (Nee Vasilakis) ז"ל on December 23, 2014 at Shalom Village, Hamilton, Ontario in her 88th year.

Beloved mother of Elena, Marilyn and Nick and very much loved grandmother to Noah, Sarah and Jamie.

Nouly came to Canada in the early 1950's and began work in her chosen field – nursing. Trained in Greece as an RN, Nouly was also Mother, caregiver, seamstress and finally in a management position at McMaster University.

Nouly was well-read, appreciated the arts and was an excellent cook. Her early life, being a small child in occupied Corfu Greece, provided many hardships and challenges. Our mother loved us all without conditions.

Nouly's last few months were spent at Shalom Village in Hamilton. She was an early volunteer when Shalom opened and she loved the home and the wonderful people. We were so happy to know that this was the place she wanted to be and that her final days were peaceful and filled with warmth.

Gone but never forgotten, her family here and in Greece will mourn her loss for ever. Mom, we love you and miss you always.

Facebook apologized to Julius Ciss, the Canadian executive director of Jews for Judaism, last week for removing a photo of his daughter holding an Israeli flag at the entrance to Auschwitz after it was tagged as being insensitive. Miriam Ciss took the picture last month on a tour of Nazi death camps and sent it to her father, whose mother and aunt survived the death camp, but whose father's and mother's families were murdered by the Nazis. Julius Ciss posted it on his group's page and was told by Facebook it was removed because "it could offend or upset some people." After the posting went viral, reaching almost two million people, Facebook apologized, saying the photo was "mistakenly flagged by one of our reps."

German Nobel winner criticized Israel

Gunter Grass, the Nobel Prize-winning German author who admitted in 2006 he had served in the Nazis' Waffen-SS, died April 13 at age 87. Grass wrote more than 30 plays and novels, as well as poetry, essays and memoirs. He's best known for his debut novel, The Tin Drum, dealing with the rise of Nazism in Danzig, Poland. He won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1999. In 2012, Grass was declared persona non grata in Israel after publishing the poem What Must Be Said, which claimed Israel was endangering world peace by threatening Iran with a nuclear attack. In interviews about the poem, Grass repeated the claim and criticized Germany for supporting the Jewish state. In a 2006 interview about his new autobiography, Grass admitted he served in the Waffen-SS, a paramilitary force he was drafted into at 16.

If only they had guns?

A Polish far-right politician lobbying for easier access to firearms says the Holocaust wouldn't have happened if every Jew had a gun. Janusz Korwin-Mikke, the only lawmaker in parliament from his Coalition for the Renewal of the Republic-Freedom and Hope, was speaking in a TV interview on the eve of Yom Hashoah. "If every Jew had a gun before the war, there would be no Holocaust," said Korwin-Mikke, a candidate in Poland's May 11 presidential vote. ■

Sephardi voices omitted

I was disappointed to see that The CJN's image of the future of Canadian Jewry appears to include so few non-Ashkenazi names ("These 24 Jews are changing the world as we know it," April 2).

I commend the recent efforts made by the paper to be more forward thinking and inclusive. I also respect and admire many of the outstanding individuals on this list. But time and time again, our institutions fail to represent the whole community, and many of us have simply stopped paying attention to organizations and publications that do not reflect our vision for modern Judaism. I hope that you revise your process for future lists and highlight some of the great work happening in all corners of our community.

Those infamous signs

In reference to the lack of hard evidence, such as photographs, of anti-Semitic signs, here are some memories on the matter ("No dogs, no Jews: No evidence," April 9).

Those of us in our 70s and 80s (or more) are not yet in our dotage. Many of us vividly remember those signs. "No Jews no dogs"; "Restricted clientele"; "Gentiles only".

Very few families had cameras, and if they were lucky enough to own one, it was used for happy occasions: visits with family and friends, the children, bar mitzvahs, weddings, etc. Who in their right mind would have wasted film on such unpleasant subjects as those signs, reminiscent of Europe, particularly during World War II? Revisionist interpretation is a dangerous sport.

Be wary of school funding

Cantor Eric Moses' impassioned plea for equality in government funding for faith-based schools in Ontario is refreshing and welcome ("Ontario should fund Jewish day schools," April 9). But we should be careful about what, exactly, we ask for.

Would funding embolden Queen's Park to demand we suppress traditional Jewish teachings about homosexuality because it doesn't fit with the secular law on same-sex marriage? Would it lead to demands we never speak of Palestinian Arab terror past or present, declaring it prejudicial to Ontarians of Palestinian Arab descent?

Perhaps what we should be asking for are permanent and major tax credits and rebates for parents, essentially full-tuition vouchers, that could only be used at faith-based schools, not secular private schools. These could be of equal financial help to parents, but not risk making our schools beholden to the secular political and social agendas of the provincial government, as the public schools currently are.

I read the article on Jews in jail ("Easily shunned: Canadian Jews behind bars," April 9) with interest.

Several years ago, I was a social worker at the Guelph Correctional Centre. The late Rabbi Philip Rosensweig, the rabbi from Kitchener and the father of Avrum Rosensweig of Ve'ahavta, used to visit the centre regularly.

We met because paycheques were distributed in a special room and he heard my last name "Katz" called out. We were friends from then on. Just a little remembrance of a wonderful man.

Memories of York U

I take strong objection to the statement "to the best of his knowledge, in his early years at York, [Martin] Lockshin was the only person to wear a kippah on campus," ("York prof to make aliyah this summer," April 9).

My late husband, Prof. Sol Tanenzapf, was brought to York University in 1968 to help start the department of Jewish studies. As an observant Jew, he always wore a kippah, be it on or off campus.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Diaspora disconnect?

Are we becoming more attuned to the complexities of the Jewish state, or are liberal Jewish leaders contributing to increased antipathy by obsessively discussing its flaws?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: With this year's celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut comes a certain uneasiness and concern for Israel that hasn't been felt in years.

While Israel's economy and technological prowess are stronger than ever, and there is greater unity overall within the country, the external threats from a nuclear Iran and a bloodthirsty Arab element in the region are looming large. Meanwhile, Israel's most important ally, the United States, is pulling away and seems to be OK with letting Israel face its existential threats on its own. Finally, Diaspora Jewry is becoming more and more apathetic, if not downright antipathetic, to Israel.

Am I being melodramatic in my concern? Should I be reassured that "this, too, shall pass," just like so many other dire threats Israel has faced in the past? Or, is there something different about the current situation that should make us fear that Israel as we know it could soon disappear?

And is there anything for us to do?

Rabbi Grushcow: The model of the Talmud is one of discussion and debate. A true friend is one who challenges you – and also has your back. That's the relationship I wish for Israel with its allies.

In terms of the Diaspora, I think there are two major factors in the disconnect you describe. First, an increasing number of Jews (myself included) were born after the Holocaust and the founding of the state, some even after the wars of 1967 and 1973. For many of us, our Jewish values call for us both to stand up for Israel and to recognize the complexity of the situation – including the suffering of other human beings.

Second, many non-Orthodox Jews feel increasingly not at home in Israel. We see our conversions not being recognized or women not being able to pray at the Kotel. It can be very disconcerting to realize that the Jewish lives we live in the Diaspora are often treated as second class in Israel.

I really believe that the more we see Israel in all its complexity and diversity, the more we will love it and be engaged with it. I grew up learning about Israel as "a land without a people for a people without a land." When I got older and realized that there were other people there before, that made me question everything I had learned – and then re-engage. Similarly, the issues of religious freedom are very real, but I'm inspired by the work being done within Israel to create a just society.

Let's trust that Israel is beautiful and meaningful and important enough that if we share the whole story, our commitment will only be stronger.

Rabbi Korobkin: I appreciate your commitment to Israel despite your conflicts about some of its social policies. At the same time, I respectfully suggest that by repeatedly invoking these issues in public when referencing Israel – almost in Pavlovian fashion – liberal Jewish leaders have contributed to the increasing antipathy of which I speak.

I, too, have ambivalent feelings about some of Israel's social issues (albeit different issues). I raise these critiques in select audiences, and rarely. My overall love for Israel has thus never been directly associated with my criticisms of it. Perhaps in the past, we took it for granted that we could speak our minds about Israel without compromising our communities' support, but unfortunately, that is no longer the case.

By toning down the negative rhetoric about Israel's social ills – real or perceived – from our pulpits, we might help stem the tide of ill will that much of Diaspora Jewry is currently feeling toward Israel.

Rabbi Grushcow: I respectfully disagree. Any critique that my more liberal colleagues and I may share comes out of a deep love of, and commitment to, Israel.

My own experience has been that Jews aren't disaffected from Israel because of the things it gets wrong (as every country does). They are disaffected because they feel like their own communities have a strict party line on Israel, with no room for dissension or debate.

For people to care, they have to be part of the conversation. Israeli society is miraculous and beautiful, complicated and challenging. I can't wait to share it with my congregants, so we can join in the conversation together. ■

What's so bad about the Kosher Switch?

A group of inventors claim to have developed a solution to one of the most pressing questions facing every Orthodox Jew: how can I turn the lights on and off during Shabbat without running afoul of the prohibition against using electricity on the day of rest?

The Kosher Switch, introduced to the Jewish world last week (see page 34) with a flurry of social media buzz, looks a lot like your run-of-the-mill light-dimming switch. But there's much more to it: inside the white plastic casing, the dimmer is not actually connected to an electrical current – instead, it acts as a sort of internal canvas onto which an electrical light pulses randomly.

Manipulating the dimmer is purely a mechanical act, the developers say, and since the Kosher Switch does not directly lead to any electrical modification, there is no reason it can't be used on Shabbat.

The Kosher Switch follows on the heels of the Shabbos App, a cell-phone-based program in development that claims to provide a halachically permissible way to send and receive text messages on Shabbat. Together, these two inventions have energized an important debate about the intersection of technology and religious observance.

It may very well be true that the Shabbos App and Kosher Switch do not transgress the letter of the law. The question is whether that's good enough, or if these devices nonetheless violate the spirit of the Shabbat rules. Even if it is technically okay to flip a switch or send a text, in other words, doing so may still infringe on the very idea of what Shabbat represents.

Orthodox authorities have been almost unanimous in opposition to the Kosher Switch, as they were to the Shabbos App before it. (On their website, the New York-based entrepreneurs behind the Kosher Switch include endorsements from several Jewish legal authorities, but some of the Orthodox rabbis involved have since claimed they were misquoted.) It's not hard to see why: for many Orthodox Jews, electrical abstention is a pillar of Shabbat observance, right up there with blessing the candles on Friday night and going to synagogue on Saturday morning. These new instruments represent a challenge to the classic Orthodox interpretation of Shabbat laws since the dawn of modern electrical science.

Technology and tradition will always be difficult to reconcile for many Jews. I include myself among them, especially when it comes to Shabbat. Still, I sure could have used a workaround to those pesky electricity laws these last few weeks.

We welcomed the latest addition to our family, a son, on the eve of Passover, literally minutes before the holiday and Shabbat arrived simultaneously. Despite all the preparation, in the hectic hours and days since then, I've found myself turning on lights, baby monitors, swings and other electrical devices on Shabbat and yom tov – anything to maintain some small degree of order, peace and quiet.

If I'd had a couple of Kosher Switches, maybe I could have at least avoided some more blatant breaking of laws – and if Shabbos App had been installed on my phone, perhaps I would have been able to share the happy news more immediately. What would have been so bad about that? ■ — YONI

Catching up with an African-American environmental activist

Gary Lytle is also an Orthodox Jew who was raised as a Christian Pentecostal

Robert Hirschfield

I have found Jewish stories by the banks of the River Ganges, near the Bagmati River in Kathmandu, but not until now, along the frozen Susquehanna, here in Harrisburg, Penn.

I am listening to Gary Lytle, a 30-something African-American in a black Sierra Club baseball cap in a hall inside the Hilton, addressing a crowd on climate change and the need for human change in response.

"You must reach out to people in your community who are different from yourselves. Potential allies whose lives you may not even be aware of."

Under his baseball cap was a black skullcap. "I am an Orthodox Jew," he told his listeners.

Lytle took me back to my yeshiva days in the Bronx, where the rabbis all wore skullcaps under their black fedoras.

Two head coverings for one head always seemed to strange to me. But in Lytle's case it struck me as symbolically correct. He was a Jew who was raised as a Christian Pentecostal, an environmentalist whose own psychological ecosystem was damaged as a soldier in the second Iraq War.

I decided I must meet him when my friend Alison Hirsch of Keystone Progress, Pennsylvania's largest online progressive action network, told me how they had to negotiate with Lytle to have him come from Philadelphia to Harrisburg before the Sabbath, and to arrange to have him speak at the Progressive Summit after the Sabbath. I was intrigued by how a new Jew shoulders the old burden of getting a place in line with the sanctity of time.

His talk was on bringing environmental awareness to African-Americans and veterans, two groups previously neglected by the Sierra Club.

"A colleague at the Sierra Club used to complain, 'We always go to the same people, to the same places. You are never going to get anything different, if you never do anything different.' When we went to African-Americans and used words like smog and dirty air, it didn't connect. But when we related dirty air and smog to asthma, it became very personal because so many African- Americans suffer from asthma. When we went to the veteran's centre in Philadelphia, they thought we were a bunch of hippies in Birkenstocks. The first time, we brought in live music. We conducted classes for a year, dialoguing with the veterans about climate change, fracking, every environmental issue you could think of. After six months, 50 veterans were actively engaged in the class."

With him were three Vietnam veterans from the class, to whom he related with a mix of jocularity and deep humility. A wise younger son who learned first from suffering, then from others who suffered.

When we sat down and spoke after the talk, in the half-light of the emptying hall, I asked Lytle about his path to Judaism. He emphasized he wasn't looking for Judaism when he found it.

"I was suffering badly with PTSD. I didn't know what God wanted from me, or even if he cared. I thought maybe he had walked away."

His choice of words surprised me. They seemed to belong to someone of a different generation, a post-World War II veteran perhaps, when a spiritual crisis was more likely to express itself "by the book." Or maybe in his case, the son of Pentecostals, not so surprising.

If nothing else, the key by which he entered the Jewish world was surprising for a man of his generation.

"I picked up Herman Wouk's This Is My God, and it lit a spark in my mind. But I only actively pursued Judaism three years ago. I was fortunate enough to have had an introduction to Judaism from a good Reconstructionist rabbi in Philadelphia. She said, 'OK, there is Reformed and there is Orthodox, and there is Conservative and there is Reconstructionist, and she explained each one. When she finished, I said, 'You know, rabbi, I think I am Orthodox.'"

He shook his head with amused wonder. It was not possible, he said, to explain the conversion process to one who hadn't undergone it. It was not even possible to explain it to oneself. The force that drove it had its own mysterious logic different from the logic that drove a war veteran to seek good alternatives to bad air.

"Judaism is what saved my life. It connected me to a kind and giving people, and to a system where family and relationships were of primary importance. I would not think of letting a Shabbes go by without sitting at a table with others. I came to Judaism with all my fears and anxieties about people still there, but I let myself be embraced whether I liked it or not."

In Jerusalem, I find the city reminds me of all the places it took for people to get there. Lytle, congregant of Mkor Habracha Orthodox Synagogue in Philadelphia, is a man who carries within him many places, dark and light, and being sensitive to all of them, unites all of them. ■

Yom Hazikaron: there will be no baptism

Avrum Rosensweig

Yoram's leg stuck out of the bunker – enough so that his commander barked at him to tuck it in. His instruction was a mild inconvenience but could save Yoram's leg.

Yoram's plugah (unit) had bunkered down in Khan Yunis preparing for a major Israel Defence Forces attack on a street known for hiding Hamas leadership.

The private's iPhone chirped out a bird call, perhaps a raven, notifying him of a text message from his friend in Toronto, Noah. It was against army policy to have a cellphone in Gaza, but Yoram had turned on the appropriate security. He shouldn't be tracked by terrorists. "Besides," Yoram laughed quietly but with attitude, "the chutzpah of the IDF."

"Where are you now?" Noah texted.

"I'm in Gaza," Yoram responded.

"Where are you?"

"I'm in sociology class in Convocation Hall," Noah answered. "I'm sitting next to a beautiful woman. She doesn't look Jewish."

An explosion went off nearby. Grey and brown calcareous sandstone bounced off of Yoram's helmet. Hamas operatives knew the Israelis were there. He wiped his eyes. No casualties. Thank God.

"Go ask her if she's Jewish," Yoram texted Noah. "I'll wait. Nothing much happening here. Only a few bullets – lol."

A minute went by. The 18-year-old Yerushalmi saw a Katyusha rocket flying overhead without majesty.

Yoram texted his friend, Moishe, the keeper of the Iron Dome nearby. "Moishe did you knock this one out?" he asked.

"Like a bat out a'hell," came the response.

"She's Jewish," Noah texted Yoram. "And she has an aunt in Sderot."

Bursts of machine-gun fire interrupted the boys' communication. Yoram scrambled to dig deeper into the rock-strewn terra. A bullet whizzed past his ear.

"Yoram. Are you there?" Noah e-yelled. "Yoram. I say she's Jewish. JEWISH."

"Shamati (I heard)," Yoram texted back. "That's good. You should date a Jewish girl, Noah. I couldn't attend a baptism for your son – lol."

The commander yelled for the troops to evacuate the area – fast! Yoram gathered his gear and looked around to see who needed help. At 18, he was the strongest in his troop. Yoram, the brother of six others, put his arm around the weakest fellow in the unit and led him down the hill to the street.

Noah was perturbed by the orphaned moments between him and his childhood friend when they were growing up in Toronto. The professor asked him to explain Goffman's theories about total institutions. Noah yammered something, enough to satisfy the lecturer.

"Yoram, are you there?" Noah texted, sensing the battle had begun.

Silence.

"YORAM ANSWER ME. There will be no baptism. Only a bar mitzvah," Noah typed in dread, feebly adding, "lol."

Again silence. The professor asked another question of Noah about Goffman, this time about interactive order. "I don't know!" Noah yelled out. "We're under attack! Can't you see?" the Canadian Jewish student screamed! Everyone stared.

Yoram was down. Blood ran out of his head. The weak boy was crying. A medic arrived. He wrapped Yoram's wounds. He pumped his chest. Another Katyusha flew overhead. The weak boy sobbed. Yoram's iPhone played the noise of a bird.

The weak boy grabbed the phone from Yoram's flak jacket pocket and read the text aloud to the downed soldier.

"There will be no baptism!" he screamed. "Yoram, only a bar mitzvah. Wake up Yoram! Wake up!"

Noah exited the grand college doors. Yoram was put on a stretcher.

The weak boy typed a note on Yoram's iPhone. "He won't wake up."

Noah fell to the cafeteria floor. He wept. ■

My fir kashes – my four questions

Bernie Farber

Reflecting on Passover just past, I've always been enthralled with the centrepiece of the Seder. As a child, I used to refer to it in Yiddish as the Fir Kashes, The Four Questions. And that got me thinking: since I officially left professional Jewish communal advocacy almost five years ago, four questions have consistently dogged me.

1. Why did you leave Jewish communal work?

As 2010 was drawing to a close, it became quite clear to me that a sea change was about to occur in Canadian Jewish advocacy. There was much talk about the financial resources being spent on advocacy and that a new, more streamlined approach would be necessary. As I kept my ear to the ground, the chatter centred more and more around the need to place a greater emphasis on Israel advocacy.

I certainly understood the need to advocate aggressively on behalf of Israel, but I felt strongly that the agency mandated to undertake this work, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), was already doing a stellar job. I saw the evolution of thinking toward a new single entity that I believed was unnecessary. Nonetheless, that's exactly what happened. Canadian Jewish Congress and the CIC were gobbled up and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) was born.

It became clear to me that CIJA's emphasis would be exactly as its name implied: Israel advocacy. I have the deepest of respect for the professionals at CIJA who advocate on our behalf, even if in my opinion the weight of that advocacy is unbalanced. However, I have always believed that social justice, human rights, refugee support and helping the impoverished were core Jewish values. Losing the necessary balance between Israel advocacy and social justice troubled me greatly.

Concomitant to these developments, I was approached by the Ontario Liberal Party to consider running for political office. I had always harboured the idea of entering politics, and with the blessings of my board, I took a leave of absence to run in the provincial riding of Thornhill. It was a great learning experience, and while I did not reach the holy political grail, it did help shape the rest of my journey.

2. Why a Liberal?

I am proud of my Liberal roots. With their emphasis on compassion, human rights and a just society, they mirror for me what Jewish core values are all about. Following in the footsteps of folks such as Irwin Cotler, Herb Gray, Robert Kaplan, Monte Kwinter, Elinor Caplan and many more was a true honour.

3. What are you doing today?

During my time off, I met an incredible socially progressive philanthropist, Michael Dan. He was then chair of the Canadian Peres Centre for Peace, on whose board I sat. We began to talk about his work, which is basically helping First Nations reach economic independence.

I helped him with the provincial political process, connecting him to a number of ministers he needed to access. Next thing you know, he asked me to work with him. Today I assist Michael in his First Nations work and administer his Paloma Foundation, which provides learning opportunities for frontline staff at homeless youth shelters.

4. Why First Nations?

I have long tried to be a champion of the underdog. As a son of a Holocaust survivor, this was simply in my DNA. As I continued my work with Michael, I began to see a synergy between the tragic histories of our two peoples. We, too, were an aboriginal people faced with prejudice, bigotry and genocide. As a Canadian Jew, I believe we have much to share with and much to learn from our First Nations. We're two peoples that have for so long travelled different, yet in some ways parallel, roads.

There is much more to be said about this. I will do so in Part 2 of this column next month. ■

Israelis in the Diaspora

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Many years ago, I took a visiting Israeli academic to lunch in a Toronto club. There were few people present, and nothing about the place was very interesting, including the food.

I was about to apologize for taking my guest to such a dull venue when he exclaimed: "If only we had places like this in Israel!" He then said that being able to have lunch in a quiet club far away from the intensity of his daily life in Tel Aviv was idyllic. He craved it. This was one reason, he said, why he was happy to be in Canada.

I thought of this last month when I read a long report in the magazine section of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz about Israelis who have come to live in St. John, N.B.

Not all of them seem to have done it for economic reasons. Several argued that it was the security and the serenity that made them move there.

At a time when Israel's prime minister and many other officials were urging Jews, particularly in Europe in view of the anti-Semitic attacks, to leave their countries and settle in Israel, some Israelis, many of them native, chose to give up reasonable jobs and uproot their families in order to find peace and quiet in this relatively remote part of the world. There are Israelis in other towns in Canada and in many places around the world.

Local Jews welcome them in the hope that they'll revive their at times dwindling communities. In some cases, longtime Jewish residents actively promote Israeli immigration. It works occasionally. Several recent arrivals have joined their congregations.

However, many more have come to assimilate and aren't likely to revive the community or to take steps to make sure that their children receive a Jewish or even a secular Hebrew education.

There was a time when being a yored – a person who "came down" from Israel in contrast to an oleh (a person who has "made" aliyah, "ascended" to Israel) was a stigma, particularly in the eyes of those who stayed behind. That's no longer the case. There are over six million Jews in Israel today, more are coming and the birth rate is high, particularly among the ultra-Orthodox. Those who leave – there are probably a million Israelis living abroad today – aren't going to wreck the country.

But most of them are likely to be lost to Judaism. Perhaps that's part of their motivation for leaving. Assimilation in Israel is virtually impossible; it won't be much of a problem in St. John or in any other place in the Diaspora.

Mercifully, most Israelis still want to stay Jewish. Periodic "happiness surveys" indicate that the overwhelming majority of those who reside in the country – including Arab citizens – are satisfied with being where they are. There's therefore no reason to be alarmed that some want out. There's hardly a country in the world, including Canada, that doesn't have maladjusted citizens.

Nevertheless, the irony of it all shouldn't escape us. At a time when aliyah is still central to the Zionist ethos and anti-Semitism renders Jewish life precarious in the Diaspora, there are Israeli Jews who go out of their way to live abroad.

Let's hope that they'll be happy there, although I seem to recall that research suggests that the best-adjusted immigrants are those who were forced to leave their country. Those who did it by choice often agonize about whether or not they've made the right one.

The Israelis in St. John and elsewhere may have exchanged discomfort at home for Diaspora Weltschmerz. They may soon discover that, despite all the problems, being a Jew in Israel is much more comfortable than trying to escape being Jewish elsewhere. Perhaps that's why some children of Israelis abroad return to serve in the Israel Defence Forces. They seem to know that, in the long run, identity trumps security and comfort. ■

Weighing in on the niqab debate

Sheryl Saperia

The federal government's attempts to ban women from wearing the niqab while reciting the oath of citizenship have sparked national debate. I contend that Canada's multiculturalism policy does not preclude the government from taking this position.

Under existing law, a citizenship judge is instructed to "administer the oath of citizenship… [while] allowing the greatest possible freedom in the religious solemnization" of taking the oath."

This qualifying language reflects the fact that our rights and freedoms, rather than being absolute, often conflict. The judiciary is tasked with assessing the legality of infringing on one right to preserve another.

Proponents of wearing the niqab at a citizenship ceremony rely in part on the principle of religious freedom – an essential component of Canadian multiculturalism.

Multiculturalism refers to state-sanctioned respect for the cultural, religious and ethnic distinctiveness of each member of society, and the protection against discrimination stemming from such differences. But a policy of multiculturalism is itself a balancing act between promoting personal freedom and constraining choices in order to preserve national unity.

At its most innocuous, our multicultural mosaic means we can appreciate the food, music, and language of people from various backgrounds. At its most egregious, cultural values have been used to defend criminal acts in Canada that can never be condoned. Honour killings, terrorism and female genital mutilation top that list.

Religious and cultural garb falls somewhere in the middle of the spectrum. Canada has generally sought to accommodate the individual's desire to wear religious symbols, highlighted by the 1990 decision to permit Sikh RCMP officers to wear turbans while in uniform.

Wearing the niqab at a citizenship ceremony is more controversial.

Basic security requirements demand that the identity of the citizenship candidate be confirmed. Reasonable accommodation is achieved under the current arrangement that allows a citizenship clerk to see the person in private.

But the actual oath of citizenship is to be recited in public. Arguably, an implicit corollary of public oath-taking is obtaining visual assurance that prospective citizens are actually reciting the citizenship oath and doing so in a heartfelt manner. The niqab is an obstacle in this regard.

There are two additional factors that exacerbate anxiety about the niqab wearer. The first is that human beings rely on reading each other's faces to interact and ascertain threat. A recent UC Berkeley study found that human facial diversity evolved from our highly visual social dealings. Animals, in contrast, rely on smell or sound. In her history of the salute, the National Post's Jane MacDougall explains that the gesture originated from the act of displaying one's face and hand to demonstrate that one posed no harm. She concludes that "showing oneself to defray concern and offer assurance is genuine and ancient and widespread." The niqab conflicts with this basic human need.

The second compounding factor is that radical Islamists, who pose a significant security threat, force women under their control to don the niqab. Thus, the face covering, which already makes some uncomfortable on a primal level, is now perceived as a greater threat because it is associated with a movement that has embraced terrorist tactics.

Relatedly, many consider the niqab to be a tool of oppression against Muslim women, who are forced to dress "modestly" by hiding themselves entirely. No doubt there are some women in Canada who choose to wear the niqab. But there may also be citizenship candidates who are coerced by family or community members to cover up. How is a citizenship judge to know when wearing the niqab preserves a woman's religious freedom and when it entrenches a woman's inequality and subjugation?

There are no simple answers to these questions. Any multicultural society will ultimately face difficult choices between minority rights and social cohesion. Time will tell how this debate is resolved. But the government is not unreasonable to maintain that the niqab should be removed during a citizenship ceremony. ■

plungen@thecjn.ca

When life give you lemons, you make lemonade.

That's just what Shaarei Shomayim Congregation did when in September 2011 a pipe burst in the shul's lower level, causing extensive damage. Repairs had to be done, but the shul took the opportunity presented by a boatload of waterlogged lemons to not only repair the damage, but bring the 49-year-old shul into the 21st century.

The results are there for all to see as Shaarei Shomayim has shed its dowdy weather-beaten look for a fresh, sunlit visage.

On May 8 and 9, the synagogue will host a community celebration called "Reopen and Rejoice" to mark the building's re-dedication. The event comes as the culmination of the shul's "Retire, Rebuild, Renew" campaign, which raised more than $6 million for a three-stage renovation project.

With work almost completely done – on time and on budget – the life of the shul will be enhanced and the membership can continue to grow, said Rabbi Chaim Strauchler.

"Everything is new, and everything is the same," he said. "When you go inside, you feel there's a new energy. But there's a sense of continuity and tradition. A member from 50 years ago would know it's the same place."

"We didn't change the essence of the shul," said architect Clifford Korman, himself a member of the congregation. "We changed 100 little things that when you add them up, it created a great new facility."

The changes are apparent even before you enter the building. Facing the synagogue's main doors on Glencairn Avenue, visitors are greeted by an open space that serves as a patio, courtyard and meeting area. A curving ramp accommodates the infirm and the disabled, making it easier to enter the building. In fact the renovation was designed to make the facility accessible all the way from the sidewalk to the bimah, said Korman.

A copper-coloured cladding protects the shul's east-facing and most weather-beaten wall.

Inside, the redesigned foyer features lots of natural light, as well as new chandeliers. The space, about 600 square feet, doubles as a grand entrance and can also be used for social occasions, such as kiddushes and parties or as overflow space from the adjacent social hall.

Changes were made to the staircase as well as to the entry to and from the social hall and sanctuary, to dampen sounds and to make traffic flow more easily, said Korman.

The carpet has been removed from the bimah and replaced with the same limestone that is featured in the Aron Kodesh. Twin ramps allow for people with disabilities to more easily mount the bimah and take part in services.

When needed, a temporary Aron can be placed on the stairs leading up to the permanent Ark to permit people in wheelchairs to be honoured with opening the Ark during services, said Rabbi Strauchler. It's all part of the shul's plan to make it more inclusive and welcoming, he added.

The old seats in the sanctuary have all been replaced with "theatre seats," each with their own armrests, and reduced in number from 750 to 650.

There is new carpeting and the sound technology has been enhanced to permit people throughout the room to better hear what is being said on the bimah.

Visitors will see major changes downstairs, on the lower level, Korman said. The beit midrash has been moved to a larger room that features natural sunlight, making it a more inviting space. The room is lined with new wooden bookshelves and new carpeting, but it retains the old brass doors to the Aron Kodesh, whose provenance can be traced back to the shul's previous location on St. Clair Avenue West near Oakwood Avenue. The beit midrash remains the heart of the synagogue, where services are held daily, as well as formal study sessions and a room where members can come, pick up a book and study on their own, Rabbi Strauchler said.

There are also renovated meeting rooms downstairs, more rooms for Netivot HaTorah Day School, whose south campus is housed in the synagogue, as well as a new roof, new heating and electrical system, and other modern upgrades. The shul changed caterers as well.

The three-phase renovation project began in 2011 after the pipe burst. The first phase was meant to repair the damage, but after that it was a case of, in for a penny, in for a pound.

As the first phase of the project was completed, aided by an insurance payout that funded 30 to 40 per cent of the cost, the congregation decided to continue to make upgrades and to renew the facility to better meet the needs of the members, said Rabbi Strauchler.

Of the synagogue's 650 member families, about half contributed toward the renovations. Four Seasons Hotels founder Isadore (Issy) Sharp was the single largest contributor, putting $1 million into the effort. The Jack Weinbaum Family Foundation contributed $500,000 towards the beit midrash, while other members contributed an average of $10,000 each.

That's a testament to the value the congregation holds in its synagogue, Rabbi Strauchler said. ■

Retiring professor fostered Jewish identity at Guelph

SHERI SHEFA

Michael Grand, who is retiring from his impressive 40-year career as a University of Guelph psychology professor, is being honoured next month for his dedication to fostering a positive Jewish atmosphere on campus.

Speaking to The CJN in advance of the May 12 event at Beth Emeth Synagogue, which will also raise funds for a Jewish student engagement fund in his honour, Grand said that when he began teaching at the university in 1974, he joined a small group of Jewish faculty and students who would take part in weekly bagel lunches.

He soon took an active role in recruiting Jewish students to come to the meals and other events organized by Guelph Hillel, then known as the Jewish Student Organization.

From 1976 until last year, Grand served as the organization's faculty adviser. He was also a member of the school's multi-faith resource team, from 1990 to 2014, and helped develop the university's religious accommodation policy.

"I spent some time trying to make the university campus a more welcoming campus for Jewish students and for all students who come with diverse backgrounds… I'm very proud of that fact," Grand said.

He said Guelph has developed into "one of the most welcoming of campuses in Canada," for Jewish students, adding that the Jewish student population has grown from two students in the mid-1970s to about 1,000 today.

Grand recalled a time when Jewish groups wanted to pull funding from the bagel lunches, but he and his peers lobbied to save them.

"We argued that the bagel lunch was a vehicle to bring Jewish students together… If we were worried about the future of the Jewish People, we had to put Jews together… A lot of kids made lasting friendships and I've attended many, many weddings of students from Hillel that began at either a bagel lunch or a Shabbaton," he said.

Hillel Ontario's executive director Donald Sylvan said that "Prof. Grand has been an influential presence in the Canadian Jewish community, including being a member of the Hillel Canada board for many years. Canadian Jewry owes a debt of gratitude to Michael Grand for his leadership and dedication."

Grand said fostering a Jewish community atmosphere on campus never felt like a job.

"It just felt like the natural thing to do. I'm a proud Jew. I have never hidden the fact that I am Jewish… and being with students was part of that for me. The kids made me feel young, and I love their excitement, and I love their interest and I love their commitment, and all of these things have enriched me," he said.

Michael Grand

"So I feel kind of strange actually being honoured, because I feel in many ways that it was they who have given me so much."

Torontonian Suzy Rosenstein, an organizer of the event who was a student at Guelph in the 1980s, recalled the impact Grand had on her.

"I'm from Philadelphia, so as soon as I got to Guelph, I got involved with the Hillel and met Michael immediately. He took me in, because I didn't have family in Guelph. He took me in as a friend. He invited me to Passover seders, and he was just a wonderful friend, and he even ended up reading our ketubah for us at my wedding," she said.

"He was very warm and accepting and not judgmental at all about whatever level of Judaism you practised. He was very inclusive and his emphasis was on connection and really building a family, like a home away from home… I honestly don't know what Jewish life in Guelph would have been like without him."

She said the upcoming event is a chance for former students and colleagues to "hear some great stories and some warm speeches and have a chance to talk to Michael again."

Rosenstein is asking former students, friends and colleagues to contribute to an online memory book at www.celebrateahero.com.

Grand said that although he's officially retiring, he's "not planning to disappear from the Guelph scene," and plans to continue volunteering for Hillel Ontario. ■

Einstein Legacy Awards mark Hebrew U anniversary

SHERI SHEFA

When the Hebrew University of Jerusalem opened its doors 90 years ago – 23 years before the State of Israel was established – it set the foundation for a culture in Israel that prides itself on academic excellence and succeeding against all odds.

On May 12, the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) will celebrate the university's 90th anniversary, as well as the centennial of the Theory of Relativity, posited by Albert Einstein, one of the institution's founders.

At the Einstein Legacy Awards, to be held at Toronto's Liberty Grand with former U.S. first daughter Chelsea Clinton as the keynote speaker, a number of families will be honoured for their commitment to social responsibility and education.

"Albert Einstein was a leader and an inspirational figure and an outstanding, remarkable scientist. He influenced the world, and his spirit and unique approach to science was adopted also by the Hebrew University. Therefore, we chose to honour all the leadership," said Rami Kleinmann, president and CEO of CFHU, an organization that is also celebrating a 70-year milestone as a Canadian fundraising arm of the university.

Albert Einstein co-founded Hebrew U.

"We're celebrating three parts. We're celebrating leadership, we're celebrating inspiration and we're celebrating science."

Kleinmann explained that Einstein, who founded the university in 1918 along with Sigmund Freud, Chaim Weizmann and others, was also the first fundraiser for Hebrew U.

"He and Chaim Weizmann held the first fundraiser in [1920]... to fundraise for the establishment of the Hebrew University. They ended up raising an astonishing amount, $2 million," Kleinmann said, adding that today, that would be the equivalent of about $25 million.

"As [former Israeli president] Shimon Peres said a couple years ago, the Hebrew University was a rare situation where a daughter gave birth to a mother because Hebrew University was established well before the state of Israel was established," he said.

"This is the only rare example where, before you even have a state, you have a university, but I think this was also part of [Einstein's] very deep understanding that in order to have the right tools to build a future state [you must] understand that the foundation is in education, and science..."

Kleinmann said that Hebrew U served as the foundation to science and academia in Israel.

"Until today, we like to talk about it as an excellent university. Israel today, in every single aspect, is thanks to the approach of putting education and striving towards excellence into the DNA of the country," he said.

"You need to create a quality of scientists, and you need to create a culture and you need to create an inspirational climate of creativity in order to be able to achieve all these goals in the area of entrepreneurship, in the area of the 'start-up nation' and in the area of coming up with a very unique and creative way to defend yourself.

"All of this together is definitely a culture that has been initiated by the Hebrew University and spilled over into many other institutions in Israel. But this is one of the major contributions that Hebrew University created and the impact that it created in Israel."

Hebrew U president Menahem Ben-Sasson, who will attend the event in Toronto next month, wrote in a letter posted to the CFHU website, that looking back over the past 90 years, the university has succeeded even beyond the expectations and dreams of its forefathers.

"Thanks to the vision of Hebrew University's founders and the determination of their successors, we have succeeded in making rigorous scientific investigation an integral part of common parlance in Israel," Ben-Sasson wrote.

"Today, too, we remain loyal to the basic principles of the founding vision: rigorous scientific inquiry along with service to society through research. In addition, we must serve as an exemplar of a multi-cultural, pluralistic, socially aware community characterized by mutual respect and co-operation." ■

Happy Yom Ha'atzmaut!

We would like to share some good news! Thanks to the community's support, we were able to breed, raise, and train Lottie, a spirited female Lab. We recently matched Lottie with her new best friend.

But Lottie isn't just any dog. Lottie is the 500th guide dog that you've helped us pair with a blind or visually impaired Israeli!

For the next eight years, Lottie will be the constant companion of Eitan, a resident of Bat Yam who lost most of his sight over 20 years ago due to a degenerative disease.

At first Eitan tried using a white mobility cane to get around. He didn't think he'd ever get back the old life he loved.

That is until he found the Israel Guide Dog Center – a discovery that changed his life forever. Eitan's first guide dog gave him his independence and confidence back.

"All of my guide dogs have improved my life five times over compared to using a cane," explains Eitan. "I go out more with a dog, sometimes whether I want to or not!"

As we celebrate Israel's independence on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we invite you to give others like Eitan – many of whom are IDF veterans or victims of terror – their own gift of independence.

Eitan is back to doing the things he loves in life. He's even returned to his favorite hobby, SCUBA diving. In fact, Eitan holds the distinction of being Israel's first blind SCUBA diver!

We know what you're thinking. With all our innovations in guide dog training, we haven't started teaching our dogs to SCUBA dive! But with your help, our dogs do give clients like Eitan the confidence to get on with their lives.

"I'm much more confident walking with a guide dog," Eitan reports. "I've been saved by my guide dog numerous times, when I've almost been hit by a car."

...MY GUIDE DOGS HAVE IMPROVED MY LIFE FIVE TIMES OVER COMPARED TO USING A CANE.

Continued →

Eitan knows first-hand how life changing a guide dog can be. So we asked him what he thought about being the recipient of our 500th dog.

"We'll see what happens when we reach 1000!" Eitan answered.

Will you please help us fulfill Eitan's wish to see 1000 dogs matched with other Israelis who want their own independence back?

A gift of any size goes a long way!

On behalf of all of our clients, our guide dogs, and everyone at the Israel Guide Dog Center, thank you! We wish you a happy Yom Ha'atzmaut!

With gratitude,

Orthodox community joins shinshinim program

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Netivot HaTorah Day School, Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and Bnei Akiva of Toronto will be the first Orthodox institutions in Toronto to participate in the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) shinshinim program.

Shinshinim, a Hebrew acronym that refers to a gap year of service, is a program developed by JAFI for North American cities and implemented in Toronto by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The program brings Israeli high school graduates to the Diaspora to volunteer for a year in various Jewish communities, educating the community about Israel and Israeli culture.

"The shinshinim program is not a new program to Toronto. Up until now it has been servicing a variety of organizations and institutions, but none of them have been Orthodox," said Rabbi Elliott Diamond, Netivot's head of Jewish studies, and leader of a minyan at Shaarei Shomayim.

"I think at some point we said, you know, we would really like to be a part of this exciting opportunity as long as the people coming to our shuls and schools reflect our values."

Rabbi Diamond explained that in late January, a group of 55 Toronto-based Jewish professionals travelled to Israel to meet with 48 shinshinim candidates selected by UJA Federation and JAFI to participate in the year-long program.

"We met with these 48 candidates, and federation along with JAFI assigned each organization its candidates according to its needs. Netivot and Shaarei Shomayim and Bnei Akiva were represented by me and my wife. We interviewed nine candidates who fit the requirements and of those nine we picked a boy and a girl.

In August, Yoni Hadad, who is currently a student at a yeshiva in Ramat HaGolan for Israeli air force candidates, and Noa Voss, an 18-year-old student who majors in classical singing, will join Toronto's Jewish community.

Rabbi Diamond said he chose Hadad and Voss because they are "bright, personable, excited, passionate, involved in their country, want to come, want to learn, what to contribute, want to make connections, want to touch people, and want to bring the excitement of modern Israel to the Diaspora.

Yoni Hadad and Noa Voss

Another important requirement was that the shinshinim candidates offer their services in the context of a religious perspective.

"We wanted the kids who are coming to our schools and shuls to sort of represent the best of the religious Zionist perspective of modern Israel, and that's what they are going to do."

Voss, who has ambitions to work in Israel's education system and eventually open a school that offers alternative teaching methods, told The CJN that she is looking forward to teaching Canadian Jewish youth about Israel.

"I think the main thing I would like to bring to Toronto's young Orthodox community is the unique lifestyle in Israel that is hard to put into words – the Israeli warmth and mutual understanding we have between each other and a certain maturity and perception of life you have to gain from a young age," Voss said.

She said she hopes the program will benefit her as much as it will benefit the institutions she plans to serve.

"I take living [in Israel] for granted although it is something that for decades people were just dreaming about. I hope that being away for the year might bring me to a bigger appreciation and understanding of what we have here," she said.

"I see the shinshinim program as an opportunity to do an act of Zionism of what it means today, as well as giving back and thanking the community for its big support of Israel." ■

Law Society Yom Hashoah panel tackles anti-Semitism

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Anti-Semitism can't be sanitized or glossed over if it's to be eliminated.

That was one of the key messages at a panel discussion hosted by the Law Society of Upper Canada April 15, in partnership with the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Entitled "How do we Stop the Rising Tide of Anti-Semitism Today: Legislation vs. Education," the talk was held at Osgoode Hall in honour of Yom Hashoah and attended by about 150 people.

Moderated by Mark Sandler, a Law Society bencher and senior partner at Cooper, Sandler, Shime & Bergman LLP, the panel consisted of Judge Ed Morgan of the Superior Court of Justice and a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Evan Zelikovitz, chair of the March of the Living digital archives project and national chair of the management committee of the Canada Israel Experience; and Elly Gotz, a Lithuanian-born Holocaust survivor.

Morgan noted that education and legislation are not, as antidotes to anti-Semitism, mutually exclusive, before delving into a discussion on what he termed "importing anti-Semitism."

He explained that even within a typically open and culturally sensitive country like Canada, there are dangers of bringing in messages of racism of anti-Semitism from other places. For example, he cited a recent incident in which online ads with the headings "You don't have to be Jewish to buy this house" and "You don't have to be Jewish to rent this house" were posted under the name of a Brampton-based real estate agent, apparently by an employee at a third-party posting service located in the Philippines.

"Presumably the anti-Semitism was not coming from Brampton, but from overseas," Morgan said.

He further gave an example of U.S. President Barack Obama commenting, in an interview with Fox News, on the shooting rampage that took place in January in a kosher supermarket in Paris.

He noted that Obama referred to the victims of the attack as "folks," rather than Jews.

"This is a kind of sanitizing of anti-Semitism... where the world generalizes it as though it's a thing everyone shares," said Morgan.

More insidious than importing anti-Semitism is ignoring it, he added, stressing that, "naming and shaming it is the real way to stop it... The law on its own can't stop it. We have to educate ourselves on it and at the very least, call it by its name."

Zelikovitz then spoke about the power of education to help quash anti-Semitism. On a recent March of the Living trip he attended, Zelikovitz said, he was struck by a survivor telling the group, "I'm not telling you these stories to sadden you, but to empower you."

Enabling younger generations of Jews to witness what happened during the Holocaust through trips such as March of the Living is a way to spread messages of hope and perseverance, not hate, he said.

Zelikovitz also spoke of the importance of Holocaust education for non-Jews, as exemplified by Conservative MP and Minister of State for Multiculturalism Tim Uppal, who is Sikh and has publicly championed a national Holocaust memorial to be built in Ottawa.

Uppal, Zelikovitz said, is married to a woman who more than a decade ago, applied to attend a March of the Living trip, despite not being Jewish. While she initially faced resistance from organizers, she was ultimately allowed to go and was praised for her inquisitiveness and sensitivity.

"This is education and legislation coming together," Zelikovitz said, suggesting that Uppal had been significantly influenced by his wife's experiences.

Gotz told the audience of being a young teenager in Lithuania when the Germans invaded the Soviet Union. After spending several years in a ghetto, he was taken to a satellite camp of Dachau, where he was put to work building an underground factory for jet fighter planes.

After being liberated by the Americans in 1945, Gotz lived first in Germany, then Norway, then Zimbabwe and South Africa and finally, Canada.

He has spoken to thousands of students at schools and universities about the Holocaust, spreading his message of the supreme importance of Holocaust education. ■

CIJA denounces Quebec union's BDS endorsement

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Luciano Del Negro

Jean Lacharité

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has denounced a major Quebec labour federation's decision to join the international boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel.

On April 14, the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN) announced that its central council had voted to join the campaign. The CSN represents 325,000 workers in both the public and private sectors, in close to 2,000 unions throughout the province.

Luciano Del Negro, CIJA's Quebec vice-president and a former CSN activist, commented that CSN leaders are imposing "a campaign of denigration of the Jewish state that the majority of its members probably don't support and of which even the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, disapproves."

CIJA characterizes BDS as "anti-Israel extremism" whose "ultimate objective...is not the resolution of the Israeli-Arab conflict but the dissolution of the only Jewish state into a new Arab state."

The CSN, which has supported the Palestinian cause for many years, is not new to BDS. Its Montreal council endorsed the campaign in 2010.

This latest move at the top level, the CSN says, is in solidarity with Palestinian unions which endorse the boycott as a means of pressuring Israel to "respect international law, end the military occupation of Gaza and the West Bank, respect the rights of Palestinian refugees and end racial discrimination against Palestinian citizens of Israel."

CSN vice-president Jean Lacharité said in a statement: "For decades, Israel has pursued in a shameful way and with violence a settlement policy of Palestinian territories and flouted international law with regard to the Palestinian people."

He said the BDS campaign in Canada must be especially vigorous to counter what the CSN views as the Harper government's "unconditional" support of Israeli "conservatives" and their "apartheid policies."

The CSN insists that BDS, launched 10 years ago by Palestinian groups, is a peaceful strategy, not anti-Semitic, and recognizes the right of Israel to exist within the pre-1967 borders. The boycott covers the economic, cultural and academic spheres, and the CSN is calling for its members and Quebecers not to buy goods from Israel or invest in Israeli companies or other "complicit" businesses or banks.

Del Negro said BDS is not in the interest of Quebec, which is benefiting from increasing bilateral relations with Israel, especially in scientific and technological innovation. He also insisted the CSN could be of more help if it used its considerable resources to bolster the economic development of the Palestinians.

Jewish community recalls Cardinal Turcotte's friendship

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca MONTREAL

The late Roman Catholic Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte was described in condolences issued by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) as a friend of the Jewish community.

Cardinal Turcotte, whose funeral was held April 17, was Archbishop of Montreal from 1990 to 2012. He died on April 8 at the age of 78.

"The Jewish community is deeply saddened by the death of Cardinal Turcotte, who for 50 years served the Catholic Church with dignity and honour," Eric Maldoff, CIJA's Quebec chair, said in a statement.

"Cardinal Turcotte was a friend who understood and appreciated the many contributions of the Jewish community to Quebec society. He will be missed."

Victor Goldbloom, a longstanding representative of the Jewish community in the group Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal, commented: "Cardinal Turcotte leaves a rich ecumenical legacy to all Quebecers."

He recalled that in 1995, the archbishop celebrated at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom the 40th anniversary of the promulgation of Nostra Aetate, the historic declaration of the Vatican revising its relationship with Judaism and other non-Christian religions to one of mutual respect.

On the 50th anniversary, he returned as guest speaker at Yom Kippur services.

In 1992, Cardinal Turcotte presided over a ground-breaking conference of Christian, Jewish and Muslim leaders held at the Grand Séminaire de Montréal.

Three years ago, the recently retired archbishop bestowed a papal knighthood upon Goldbloom, a rare honour to a non-Catholic, in a ceremony held at the temple, in recognition of his pioneering interfaith work.

"I know few people who stand so firm in their religious conviction, while being so open to listening to those of others," Cardinal Turcotte said at the time. He had recommended to the Vatican this recognition of Goldbloom, a friend for more than 30 years.

Goldbloom and Myriam Azogui-Halbwax, CIJA's associate director of community and university relations, officially represented the Jewish community at the funeral, held at Mary Queen of the World Cathedral. ■

Weizmann Canada celebrates women in science

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some 300 people will gather next week to learn about success from a panel of accomplished women at Weizmann Canada's second annual Wonderful Women event.

The April 28 panel includes moderator Pattie Lovett-Reid, chief financial commentator, for CTV News; musician Jann Arden; Olympic gold-medal rower Marnie McBean; physicist Hagar Landsman of the Weizmann Institute of Science; and Beth Horowitz, former president and CEO of the Amex Bank of Canada.

"These women have all come from areas where, purely by brains, talent and motivation, they have worked themselves up to become foremost in their fields," said event chair Michele Atlin.

The presenters will share their success stories, obstacles they have overcome, and the factors that motivated them to become leaders in their fields.

"Impressionable young women can see what these women have achieved on our panel and that anything is possible. If you work hard and you are motivated and you are passionate about what you do, then you can overcome various challenges and reach this pinnacle of achievement," Atlin said.

The evening will begin with 6:30 p.m. cocktails and conclude with a dessert reception and book signing with Arden. All guests will receive a complimentary copy of her memoir Falling Backwards.

Philanthropist Marvelle Koffler founded the International Weizmann Women for Science in 1988.

"The idea originated in Israel and was then founded in Canada with a committee of women. This knowledge-based community has now engaged a younger generation of women that continues to learn from and promote the exceptional world-renowned scientific achievements of Weizmann. It's a true example of women empowering women, and ultimately science," said Marvelle's daughter, Tiana Koffler Boyman.

Weizmann Canada has chapters in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, and Calgary. Its mission is to raise awareness for the Weizmann Institute, develop sustainable philanthropic support for it, and encourage science literacy.

The Wonderful Women event is aiming to raise more than $100,000. The proceeds will help fund two post-doctoral fellows under Weizmann's National Post-doctoral Program for Advancing Women in Science. It allows recipients to train at leading international institutions for two years, with the objective that they return to Israel for an academic career. The aim is to provide strong role models to motivate and encourage the next generation of young female scientists.

"These women [on the panel] have done it. Other women can do it. We want to celebrate all women," Atlin said.

Based in Rehovot, Israel, Weizmann is one of the world's leading multidisciplinary institutes of basic research. Its scientists have made a global impact in a variety of areas ranging from health and medicine to alternative energy and security and technology.

"Over the last five years, the Weizmann Institute has been responsible for major breakthroughs in diabetes, Crohn's and colitis, 83 different autoimmune diseases, and research linking inflammation to cancer. Weizmann is synonymous with excellence," Atlin said.

"I shep naches every day. There is always something exciting to talk about." ■

Anglican Church reissues document on anti-Semitism

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Archdeacon Bruce Myers.

To coincide with Yom Hashoah, the Anglican Church of Canada last week re-released a 1989 document stressing its opposition to anti-Semitism and acknowledging its historical complicity in Jewish persecution.

From Darkness to Dawn: Rethinking Attitudes Towards Jews and Judaism in the Light of the Holocaust, which can be found on the church's website, is a 64-page study guide produced by the now defunct subcommittee on Jewish-Anglican relations of the church's national executive council, the predecessor to the church's current governing body, the Council of General Synod.

The document's re-release – which Archdeacon Bruce Myers, the church's co-ordinator of ecumenical and interfaith relations, stressed could be of value not just to Anglicans, but all Christians – was prompted by a Anglican General Synod resolution passed in 2013 committing the church to "strengthen relationships with Jews and Muslims [and] resolutely oppose anti-Semitism, anti-Arab sentiments and Islamophobia."

Initially written in response to the church's 1983 resolution to "deplore recent expressions of anti-Semitism in Canada," the 1989 document was intended as a resource to help parishioners, congregations and study groups better understand Judaism, as well as Christianity's roots in Judaism and how Christianity has misunderstood Judaism in ways that contributed to the marginalization or persecution of Jews in the past.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the document has "aged remarkably well" and is "an honest attempt to consider the terrible roots of anti-Semitism and the fruits it bore in the middle 20th century."

Archdeacon Myers said he discovered the original document while researching Anglican-Jewish relations, and having been unaware of its existence, thought, "perhaps this document hadn't been received by the church and its members in the way that had been intended."

Save for a new preface he wrote, the document has been left unchanged, because, he said, "though the case studies cited in [it] seem a bit dated, the wider themes and questions the document raises are just as timely as ever."

The Anglican Church has, he said, been looking to strengthen relations with Jews, particularly since the 2012 suspension of the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation (CJCC), a roundtable comprising representatives from Canadian Jewish Congress (CIJA's predecessor) and an assortment of national church bodies, including the Anglican Church.

CIJA stepped away from the table after the General Council of the United Church of Canada boycotted goods produced by Israeli companies in the West Bank.

"The decision made by the General Council of the United Church remains, and we remain away from the table," Rudner said. "To restore our relationship with the General Council of the United Church, they'd have to rescind their position [on boycotts]."

He said CIJA continues to work with individual United Church congregations and that its issue is with the General Council.

In a statement, Gail Allen, the United Church's co-ordinator of interchurch and interfaith relations, didn't address the boycott issue, but said her church "would certainly want to affirm [the Anglican church's] decision to engage in the kind of study they're talking about. She added that the United Church "encourage[s] our members to seek opportunities to meet with Jews, learn about Judaism… and be aware of, and vigilant about, resisting anti-Semitism."

Despite progress in terms of Christians better understanding of Christianity's origin in Judaism, Archdeacon Myers said, anti-Semitism remains, even in places as seemingly tolerant as Canada.

"Whether just in casual conversation or more public demonstrations of intolerance against Jews, such as the desecration of cemeteries… [and] a detectable spike in public acts of anti-Semitism in different parts of Canada last summer… We need to be constantly vigilant and not be lulled into a false sense of 'anti-Semitism is an issue of the past,'" Archdeacon Myers said.

From Darkness to Dawn references Canadian Holocaust deniers James Keegstra and Ernst Zundel, who were prominent when it was written:. "We did discuss internally whether we should come up with more recent examples of anti-Semitism or tweak some of the text. But mainly we chose to re-release it [without changes] to acknowledge the enormous amount of work that went into it," he added. ■

Sudbury Wolves choose Israeli first overall in 2015 OHL draft

plungen@thecjn.ca

David Levin

David Levin has lived in the Greater Toronto Area for three years now, and in that time he's been immersed pretty deeply in Canadian hockey culture. Not only is he a skilled player on the ice, the Israeli-born Levin has adopted the code of a typical Canadian player: work hard, never give up and say nice things about the place where you play.

A star forward with the Don Mills Flyers AAA Minor Midget team, he was recently picked first overall by the Sudbury Wolves in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) draft.

Levin joins a list of hockey's who's who as first overall picks, including Connor McDavid (touted to go first in the NHL Entry Draft this year), Aaron Ekblad (Florida Panthers) and Alexander Galchenyuk (Montreal Canadiens).

Not bad for a kid from Netanya who cut his teeth playing the inline (rollerblade) version of the sport. A perennial MVP in international tournaments, he moved to Canada to develop his skills and reach his ultimate goal – playing in the NHL.

Naturally, Levin is pleased with his first-overall selection. "It's amazing," he said, not long after a visit to Sudbury. "It's really exciting for me. I came from Israel where there's no ice and I'm drafted first... I hope I make the fans there happy."

Levin, who stand 5-10 and weighs 160 pounds, is likely to play the next three or four years in Sudbury. His NHL draft year is not until 2018.

His team is naturally ecstatic at landing such a slick and creative forward.

"David is an outstanding hockey player and is the dynamic forward that the Sudbury Wolves need to build a winning team around," said team president and general manager Blaine Smith. "David's skills and offensive talent will be appreciated by his coaches, his teammates and hockey fans here in Sudbury."

Head scout Andrew Shaw said Levin has improved "by leaps and bounds in each of his three short years playing hockey" in Canada. "If David's development continues to improve at the same rate, his potential as an OHL player is off the charts. David was obviously born with a special gift and he has simply developed into an incredible hockey player."

Wolves' coach Dave Matsos said Levin combines great character, raw natural talent and a high "compete level."

Levin is a humble guy who probably doesn't fully appreciate the significance of being chosen first overall, Matsos said.

He is well respected by his contemporaries. In advance of the draft, Matsos contacted other highly ranked players and asked who, other than themselves, they'd like to be drafted with. Ninety per cent said Levin. "They said he's skilled, he's unpredictable. He's so creative, you can't anticipate [what he's going to do next.]"

Heady praise indeed, and while Levin is something of a magician with the puck, not all his abilities are God-given. It takes long hours of practice to become a natural. He practised with the Flyers twice a week. And he's in the gym working out pretty much every day.

He attends the Hill Academy, a school for gifted athletes, and three times a week at 6 a.m., he's on the ice at the school, practising his moves. His pro heroes are Sidney Crosby, Evgeni Malkin and Pavel Datsyuk, and he tries to copy what they do on the ice, he said.

"I work on my moves and I try new passes so no one knows where they come from," he said. "Now, when I go on the ice, I try to make my own moves."

All that hard work paid off with a remarkable season. He led the Flyers in scoring with 80 points in 55 games, including 39 goals.

Levin was born and raised in Israel. His father is from Latvia and was the man behind Israel's inline hockey league. Levin took to the sport readily and excelled at all levels. He barely played any ice hockey, given the country's only full-sized rink is in Metulla, a four- or five- hour drive from Netanya.

At 12, Levin moved to Canada to pursue his hockey dreams. He lives with his aunt and uncle. He still calls home three times a day and he'll be heading back to Israel this summer for a five-week visit.

After a little time off, he'll be back in the gym to get ready for the upcoming season. He figures he can also do some on-ice training in the mini rink in Holon.

Then it's back to Sudbury for a new chapter in his hockey life.

Though Israeli, he hopes to make Team Canada's Under-17 team and play for his adopted homeland. Who's to say he won't make it. His credo remains: "Always work hard, never give up. Always go for it." ■

The problem with the March of the Living

Jessica Lang
JTA

The evening before we visited Auschwitz, over pizza with a group of young people in Oswiecim, the town on whose outskirts lies that infamous symbol, one of my students approached me with tears in her eyes.

Tears are hardly uncommon to visitors of sites of mass death. But for this student – a participant in a week-long trip to Auschwitz undertaken as part of a course on Holocaust history and literature that I teach at Baruch College in New York City – the trip marked her first time on a plane, her first time in a foreign country, and her first time experiencing an academic setting that didn't involve a laptop and a classroom located at a busy Manhattan intersection.

Unable or unwilling to bridge these two worlds – a crossing of time and space that seven decades after the war's end enables a group of American students to casually dine with European counterparts at the edge of history's most notorious killing centre – she felt lost, detached from all that was familiar and unsure of what lay ahead.

Students on our trip were a diverse group, self-identifying as Latina, Jamaican, Polish, Israeli, Moroccan, Mexican and American, among others. By day, we toured sites essential to a historical understanding of the Holocaust. In the evening, we discussed readings connected to the places we had visited. Some students shared their own journals, which joined Primo Levi and Ruth Kluger as texts for analysis and reflection.

The great advantage of looking at the Holocaust in this way is that it eliminates the notion that this history belongs more to one person than another. This democratic take on the Holocaust makes the experience meaningful, even transformative, for everyone.

Typical Jewish teen tours hold themselves to a poorer standard. Confined to Jewish youth, the trips eliminate the diversity of voices essential to ensure that the imperative of remembrance is broadly observed. Aimed principally at Jewish identity building through the Holocaust, they offer a limited rendering of history, narrow in reach.

Trips like the March of the Living, which completed its 27th iteration earlier this month, fail the objective of Holocaust remembrance itself through sheer simplification, making the genocide of European Jewry a subject to be explored among friends, rather than the profound wrestling with history and its consequences that it could be. As a former participant in the march, I find its goals around Israel and Jewish identity laudable. But the very fact that it even has such goals makes it doctrinaire by nature rather than inquiring.

In a diverse intellectual environment like our trip, it is the questions, not the answers, that define the approach. And by sharing the richness of their own varied backgrounds and perspectives, my students discovered that the unavailability of easy answers to the questions posed by the Holocaust is important – essential even – to their learning.

It's not a comfortable place to be. Learning to live with ambivalence is a hard lesson for undergraduates, but an essential one. After we returned home, one student approached me about the final paper he was struggling to write. The sheer enormity of our trip was proving paralytic. He felt powerless trying to confine his thoughts and analysis in a tidy little paper – a reaction that in itself might be the most important lesson learned.

It may never be possible to fully imagine or understand this history, and doing so surely grows more elusive with time. But by actively studying, analyzing, visiting, speaking and thinking about the Holocaust, by refusing to make a trip to Auschwitz easy or comfortable by fully embracing the intellectual challenge it presents, may be the best way to best remember. ■

Why we must choose to remember

Sigmund Rolat

Remarks to March of the Living participants, April 16 at Auschwitz-Birkenau.

We have all gathered here to remember. From all sides, we are called upon not to forget. But why should we remember at all?

If I had a choice I would prefer not to remember. Not to remember the Czestochowa Ghetto where my family and I, then a child, were imprisoned. Not to remember the killings of my father and mother, of my brother and family members, of my Polish nanny Elka who chose to remain in the ghetto because she loved a Jewish child – me. Not to remember the daily humiliation, the routine of murder, the hunger, the cold, and the numbing knowledge that we are powerless and alone. I would prefer not to have these memories, but I do not have the choice. Why then choose memory if you are not forced to?

I can think of four reasons.

The first is simple solidarity. If you choose my memories, this means that we together are no longer with them alone. Each time we reach out to the legacy of horror, we make a crack in the ghetto wall, a breach in the barbed wire. Not that we can tear them down – it is 70 years too late for that. Walls built with blood and death survive their physical downfall. They need to be pulled down day by day by remembering.

The second is simple decency. The Germans had managed not only to murder the six million: they murdered also the memories of them ever having existed. True, the great majority of those then killed would have passed away by now, even had there been no Shoah. But they would have lived on in the memories of their children and friends, in the record of the achievements and even failures of their lives. The Shoah eliminated all that as well. Your remembrance is their only chance.

The third reason is simple fear. It is an illusion to believe that Auschwitz can be forgotten simply because the right side won the war. Auschwitz remains with us forever always waiting to be realized again. Do not believe the magic incantation of "Never again": it has happened again. Think of Bosnia, Sudan, Rwanda. In different ways, to different peoples – but it has. The Shoah remains unique in the sense it was unprecedented. But all genocides are tragic in their own ways, and remembering them is the first step to preventing their recurrence. Remembering is, after all, the least we can do.

> If I had a choice, I would prefer not to remember... but I do not have the choice.

And so we stand here in solidarity, mourning and fear. Our unity is rooted not only in our Jewish peoplehood, which we share with those whom we remember today. Their Jewishness was not incidental to their fate: it determined it. But our unity today encompasses all, Jews and non-Jews, who remember, grieve and mourn – and participate in our solidarity.

In a world in which once again there are places where it is not safe to be Jewish, today's meeting assumes an added dimension. For Poland, on whose occupied soil the Germans had placed the abomination of Auschwitz, is today a place where it is safe to be a Jew. Poland now embraces its small but thriving Jewish community. Our history is cherished in the Polin Museum, which has recently opened in Warsaw. And next to the museum we shall build a monument to those Poles who – like my Elka – risked their lives to save Jews from the chimneys of Auschwitz. From the ghetto walls of Czestochowa. From the abyss.

And our gratitude toward them is the fourth reason to remember. God bless you and your memories. ■

Sigmund Rolat is a native of Czestochowa, Poland, a Holocaust survivor, one of the founders of Polin: The Museum of the History of Polish Jews in Warsaw, and an internationally known philanthropist.

European Jewry in trouble, Yom Hashoah event told

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

The future of European Jewry is precarious, to say the least, with fear and uncertainty growing and spreading from country to country.

This pessimistic, yet realistic, assessment was shared by Julien Klener at the Ottawa commemoration of Yom Hashoah, which marked 70 years since the end of World War II.

Klener, who was a hidden child in Brussels during the war, is a world-renowned academic and speaker who, since 2000, has been president of the Consistoire Central Israelite de Belgique, the official Jewish umbrella organization representing Judaism to the Belgian state. He delivered his address to a standing-room-only crowd of more than 450 people at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on April 16.

"I am, indeed, a genuine European Jew, born and raised in Europe," said Klener as he proceeded to share his experiences and opinions of life for Jews in 2015 Europe.

According to Klener, anti-Zionism has been replaced by anti-Judaism, with no attempt to hide or pretend otherwise.

"Isn't it outrageous that we are still discussing the foul subject of anti-Judaism [70 years after the Holocaust]? Outrageous, yes, but not surprising... anti-Judaism is so deeply rooted in the European psyche that it never died. It merely went underground," he said.

"Is there a future for Jews in Europe? I don't know. What I hope is that Jewish people will have the wisdom to know when it is high noon. The situation in Europe is not good. People don't feel safe any more. I don't know what the future is."

The evening's keynote speaker, Pinchas Gutter, was a child of seven when the war broke out. He, his twin sister and entire family fled their hometown of Lodz, Poland, for what they had hoped would be safety in Warsaw. Instead, they spent more than three years in the Warsaw Ghetto and were then deported to the death camp Majdanek, where Gutter's parents and sister were murdered.

He shared his experiences in the camp with the audience, along with his fortunate tale of survival. After liberation, Gutter was taken to Britain with other children, then spent many years in South Africa before immigrating to Toronto where he now lives.

Naomi Azrieli, CEO of the Azrieli Foundation, which supported the Jewish Federation of Ottawa in presenting the Yom Hashoah commemoration, was the event's MC. She noted the attendance of various local and federal politicians as well as representatives of several embassies.

Rafael Barak, Israel's ambassador to Canada, addressed the audience. He said that Yad Vashem has chosen to trace the lives of survivors after liberation.

"These people with broken hearts and families emerged from the horrors of the past to build new futures... today we are so incredibly privileged to have some of those brave souls with us," he said.

Six of those survivors then lit memorial candles, each representing one million lost lives.

Veterans of the Canadian Armed Forces marched on the colours to open the program and marched off the colours following the chanting of Kel Maleh Rachamim and the recitation of Kaddish by Gutter. ■

Winnipeg shuls host Conservative women's conference

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

The intra-continental region of the Women's League for Conservative Judaism (WLCJ) is holding its annual conference in Winnipeg this year for the first time since 2006, and local co-chairs Randy Schwartz and Sandy Polanski say they've put together a balanced program.

Nine years ago, Winnipeg was part of the midwest region, which extended from Winnipeg and Saskatoon south to include Missouri and Kansas. Shortly after the 2006 conference, the midwest region merged with the southwest region – consisting of Oklahoma, Texas and Mexico – to create the intra-continental region.

"Our region is one of the largest demographically," said Schwartz, who represents Congregation Etz Chayim and is also a WLCJ international vice-president. "It behooves us to get together at regular intervals face to face."

Polanski, who represents Shaarey Zedek, said about 75 WLCJ members are registered to attend the conference, and roughly one-third are from out of town.

Schwartz said the WLCJ has 13 regions overall in North America, with a total membership of more than 75,000. The WLCJ is dedicated to the perpetuation of traditional Judaism in the home, community and synagogue. The organization raises money in support of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the American Jewish University in California, the Seminario Rabinico Latinoamericano in Buenos Aires and the Schecter Institute in Jerusalem.

Shelly Goldin

Rabbi Alan Green

The keynote speaker for the conference, which takes place April 25 to 28, will be Shelly Goldin, a WLCJ consultant from Maryland, whose major presentation will focus on adapting to change. At a second presentation, Goldin will be illustrating the elements of leadership by telling stories that balance fiction and reality.

Also speaking at the conference will be two local congregational rabbis – Congregation Shaarey Zedek's Rabbi Alan Green and Etz Chayim's Rabbi Larry Lander – who will discuss different perspectives on finding spiritual balance through Torah study and will take part in an informal question-and-answer session with conference attendees titled "Rap with the Rabbis."

Other speakers include Rush Ashrafi, Shaarey Zedek's program co-ordinator and Judaic studies co-ordinator at Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education, speaking about Israel; Bonnie Cham, a past president of Shaarey Zedek who will discuss physician-assisted suicide; and holistic educator Dawn MacDonald, who will be guiding participants in "finding balance in life through mindfulness."

Schwartz said the conference will also include a "speedfest" – akin to speed dating – in which participants will take part in a series of 15-minute sessions on five different topics related to the WLCJ, as well as a concert featuring Shaarey Zedek and Etz Chayim cantors Anibal Mass and Tracy Kasner Greaves, along with Shayla Fink, who is best known as a member of the klezmer group Finjan.

The highlight of the conference will be the installation of new intra-continental region president Ardis Wexler from Minneapolis.

Schwartz said WLCJ membership at Winnipeg's two Conservative synagogues stands at about 250.

"We offer a variety of educational programs and are constantly trying to get more people involved," she said, "but, like many other organizations, it is a struggle attracting younger women. Younger people do not seem to be joiners." ■

Clinton weighs loyalty to Obama with differences on Israel

JTA
WASHINGTON

Hillary Clinton did not appear until 90 seconds into the two-minute video rolling out her campaign. No one among the bright and diverse array of everyday Americans in that video mentions foreign policy. Or President Barack Obama.

Jewish Democrats say the video released April 12 to launch Clinton's presidential campaign is emblematic of the approach that Clinton is likely to take as she tries to straddle her loyalty to Obama with the perceived need to distance herself from the tensions that have characterized his administration's relationship with Israel.

That tack is embedded in her statement issued March 29 through Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

"Secretary Clinton thinks we need to all work together to return the special U.S.-Israel relationship to constructive footing, to get back to basic shared concerns and interests, including a two-state solution pursued through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians," Hoenlein said, describing a phone conversation he initiated with Clinton.

Clinton, notably, is once removed from the statement, delivered in Hoenlein's voice. Obama is not mentioned, but she calls for a "return" to "constructive footing," an acknowledgment that the relationship has gone off track.

"The language she used very much indicated it is time to reignite the bonds that are essential to the countries and how the U.S.-Israel relationship is perceived by the rest of the world," said Steve Grossman, a past president of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, who supported Clinton in her first presidential bid in 2008 and is backing her for 2016.

Steve Rabinowitz, a senior communications official in the Bill Clinton administration who now runs a public relations consultancy, said there is "no needle to thread": Clinton and Obama worked well together when she was his secretary of state in his first term, Rabinowitz said, and she would be able to distinguish herself from the president without diminishing his accomplishments.

> She's really in between a rock and a hard place

"It will be obvious she has her own vision of the world and that none of this is disrespectful of the president," said Rabinowitz, who backed Clinton in 2008 and this year helped found the fundraising group Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary.

Barbara Goldberg Goldman, a Democratic activist who campaigned for Obama in 2008 and 2012 and now backs Clinton, said attempts to cast Obama as harmful to Israel were "shameful." She expected Clinton would focus on the domestic issues that draw Jewish majorities to Democrats.

"When you look at polls and talk about the Jewish community in terms of what issues are most important, Israel's not on there," Goldman said, noting that Jewish voters are concerned mostly with the economy – the issue on which Clinton's campaign launch video focused.

Some Jewish Democrats who have had longstanding relationships with the Clintons said Hillary Clinton could ill afford to alienate the party's base by appearing to attack Obama.

"She's really in between a rock and a hard place," said a former top party official who worked closely with the Clintons in the 1990s and has strong ties to the pro-Israel community.

"Most Democratic voters in primaries in particular will look for someone who is agreeing with Obama on everything," said this former official, who spoke anonymously in order not to alienate any candidate. "Some of the most prominent Jewish Democratic donors are very concerned about the relationship the president has had with (Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin) Netanyahu and the Iran deal."

Obama and Netanyahu have been at odds for years over Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking and the nuclear negotiations between the major powers and Iran. Obama backs the outline of an Iran deal released earlier this month, which trades sanctions relief for restrictions aimed at keeping Iran from becoming a nuclear power. Netanyahu has said the deal, to be completed by June 30, would leave Iran a nuclear weapons threshold state and endanger Israel.

Clinton, as secretary of state in Obama's first term, was deeply involved in the ultimately failed Israeli-Palestinian talks as well as in laying the groundwork for the Iran talks.

In statements since then, she has simultaneously endorsed Obama administration efforts while subtly staking out a position to the right. After this month's deal outline was released, Clinton called it an "important step" but added that "the devil is in the details."

A major donor both to the Democratic Party and pro-Israel causes wondered whether Clinton is the unalloyed Israel supporter she was during her term as U.S. senator from New York, from 2001 to 2009, or the secretary of state loyal to Obama.

"The senator was good on Israel, the secretary was average," said this donor, who also asked not to be identified in order not to alienate candidates.

Clinton in her most recent autobiography, Hard Choices, depicts herself as unabashedly in love with Israel. But like Obama, she is also clearly ambivalent about Netanyahu.

In the book, she called the slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin a "close friend" and former prime minister and president Shimon Peres an "old friend." She said Tzipi Livni, a former opposition leader and a key negotiator in the talks with the Palestinians, was "smart and tough." And then, upon Netanyahu's 2009 election: "I had known Netanyahu for years. He is a complicated figure."

She describes her March 2010 phone call to Netanyahu after Israel's government embarrassed Vice-President Joe Biden during a visit to Israel by announcing plans for new building in eastern Jerusalem.

"I didn't enjoy playing the bad cop, but it was part of the job," she wrote.

But Republicans won't let her get off the hook so easily.

Matt Brooks, who directs the Republican Jewish Coalition, said he will cast a Clinton presidency as a third term for Obama.

"She was the one who proudly talked about spending 45 minutes on the phone yelling at the prime minister," he said, referring to the 2010 call. ■

Two notable rabbis die

Two notable rabbis died this week.

Rabbi Elio Toaff, who served as the chief rabbi of Rome for 51 years died April 19 two weeks before his 100th birthday.

And Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, among the most prominent rabbis in Modern Orthodoxy and the Israeli national-religious movement, died on April 20 at the age of 81.

Rabbi Toaff served as chief rabbi from 1951 to 2002, and is considered an important figure in the history of Italy and of European Jewry.

He welcomed Pope John Paul II on his historic April 1986 visit to the Great Synagogue, the first known visit by a pope to a synagogue in some 2,000 years.

Rabbi Lichtenstein was a noted and prolific Jewish legal authority, head of the Har Etzion Yeshiva, a key religious seminary in the Israeli religious-Zionist world, and the son-in-law of famed American Modern Orthodox spiritual leader Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik.

He was born in Paris in 1933, the year the Nazi party rose to power in neighbouring Germany, but fled Vichy France with his family in 1941 for the United States. The family settled in New York in 1945, where Rabbi Lichtenstein studied in religious seminaries and eventually entered Yeshiva University.

He was invited to jointly head, with Rabbi Yehuda Amital, the Har Etzion Yeshiva, located in the Etzion Bloc in the West Bank south of Jerusalem, in 1971, and has lived in Israel ever since. ■

Germany must remember its past, foreign minister says

JTA
BERLIN

Germany must remember its past and "stand against injustice, against any form of xenophobia and discrimination," its foreign minister said at the former Nazi concentration camp Sachsenhausen.

Frank-Walter Steinmeier laid down the challenge at a ceremony marking 70 years since the liberation of the camp, near Berlin, where tens of thousands of Jews and other inmates died during World War II.

"Do we want to live in a country where there is still anti-Semitism and exclusion? Where asylum homes are set on fire? Where a young man is beaten up on a Berlin subway because he is a Jew?" Steinmeier asked.

More than 200,000 people were incarcerated in Sachsenhausen. Some 3,000 were still alive when the camp was liberated on April 22-23, 1945.

The tens of thousands who died were killed by starvation, disease, forced labour and a death march.

"The crimes of the Nazi regime are without equal," Steinmeier said. "They make us shudder – the murder of millions of Jews in Europe, the crime against humanity that is the Shoah."

He praised the "deep friendship" between Israel and Germany and the "flowering of Jewish life" in Germany, AFP reported.

A second ceremony was held Sunday at the Ravensbruck concentration camp near Berlin, where more than 27,000 people, mostly women, died. ■

Is the Kosher Switch really kosher for Shabbat?

URIEL HEILMAN
JTA NEW YORK

It promises a revolutionary innovation that could transform Jewish Sabbath observance.

By changing the way a light switch works, the patented Kosher Switch offers a novel and, its backers say, kosher – way to turn light switches (and, perhaps, other electrical appliances) on and off during Shabbat, circumventing one of the Sabbath's central restrictions: the use of electricity.

In just four days last week, the product's backers reached their $50,000 fundraising goal on Indiegogo, the crowdsourced fundraising website, to start manufacturing the device.

Menashe Kalati, the device's inventor, calls it a "long overdue, techno-halachic breakthrough."

But critics say the Kosher Switch isn't really kosher for Shabbat at all and that Kalati is misrepresenting rabbinic opinions on the matter to give the false impression that he has their endorsements.

At issue is whether the device's permissibility for Shabbat relies on a Jewish legal loophole that applies only to extraordinary circumstances such as medical or security needs. The loophole, known as a "gramma," allows for indirect activation of electronic devices on Shabbat.

How does gramma work? If, for example, a non-life-threatening field fire is burning on Shabbat, jugs full of water may be placed around the fire to indirectly cause its eventual extinguishing. Dousing the fire directly – a Sabbath prohibition – is permitted only in life-threatening circumstances.

Kalati, 43, says his switch does not rely on the gramma loophole. When the switch is in the off position, a piece of plastic blocks an electronic light pulse that when received turns on the light. Turning the switch on moves the piece of plastic, which is not connected to anything electrical, so that it no longer obstructs the pulse. Because the light pulse is subject to a "random degree of uncertainty" and won't instantaneously kindle the light when in Sabbath mode, it is kosher for use on Shabbat, according to the video.

This "adds several layers of halachic uncertainty, randomness, and delays, such that according to Jewish law, a user's action is not considered to have caused a given reaction," the company says on its website. (Kalati's office did not respond to phone calls or emails from JTA).

Kosher Switch's backers crowdfunded $50,000 in just four days last week. KOSHER SWITCH VIDEO

In the Indiegogo video, Kalati says his team has spent years on research and development, during which "we've been privileged to meet with Torah giants who have analyzed, endorsed and blessed our technology and endeavours."

But Yisrael Rosen, head of the Zomet Institute, the leading designer of electronic devices for use on the Jewish Sabbath, says the Kosher Switch is unfit for Sabbath use. "Today, Israeli media reported the invention of an electric 'Kosher switch' for Shabbat, with the approval of various rabbis.

Critics say rabbinic endorsements in video misleading

This item was recycled from 2010 and already then denials and renunciation by great rabbinic authorities were published regarding everyday use for this product," Rosen wrote April 14 on Zomet's website. "No Orthodox rabbi, Ashkenazi or Sephardi, has permitted this 'gramma' method for pure convenience."

Rosen appended a letter from Rabbi Yehoshua Neuwirth, the first rabbi whose endorsement appears in the Kosher Switch video – in a one-second pull-quote reading "I, too, humbly agree to the invention" – suggesting that his endorsement was misrepresented.

"To allow one a priori to turn on electricity on Shabbat – impossible, and I never considered permitting except for the needs of a sick person or security," reads the letter, which bears Rabbi Neuwirth's signature and letterhead and is addressed to the manager of Kosher Switch. "And please publicize this thing so no [Sabbath] violation will be prompted by me."

The son of another rabbi whose endorsement appears in the video, Rabbi Noach Oelbaum (who says it does not violate the prohibition on Sabbath-day labour), told JTA that his father's position was distorted.

"I regret that my father's position on Kosher Switch was misrepresented by stating that he endorses it l'maaseh," the son, Moshe Oelbaum, wrote in a statement, using the Hebrew term for "regular use."

Oelbaum said his father's true position is that while the switch does not involve a technical violation of the Sabbath prohibition against labour (which forbids electricity use), it is a desecration of the Sabbath spirit. Oelbaum advises consumers to consult their own rabbis on the question of whether or not they may use it on Shabbat.

Kosher Switch is hardly the first technological innovation devised to ease Sabbath observance. For decades, Sabbath-observant Jews have used electronic timers set before Friday night to control lights and appliances such as air conditioners or hot plates. Multistorey buildings throughout Israel and some in the United States and Canada have Shabbat elevators that can run on autopilot. In 2004, Canadian rabbi and entrepreneur Shmuel Veffer invented a bedside-style lamp called Kosher Lamp that could be "turned off" by twisting a cylinder encasing a lit bulb so that the bulb was completely concealed.

> I regret that my father's position on Kosher Switch was misrepresented
> Moshe Oelbaum

The Zomet Institute, located in the Jerusalem suburb of Gush Etzion, in the West Bank, has invented baby sensors, sump pump gadgets, hot water heater contraptions, and special switches that modify wheelchairs, hospital beds, electronic scooters and staircase elevators for use on Shabbat. However, many of these devices rely on the gramma loophole and are permitted only for medical or security use.

Many observant Jews also rely upon non-Jews for help circumventing Sabbath restrictions, though such requests for help are forbidden from being expressed explicitly.

The Kosher Switch video parodies this problem of using "Shabbos goys" with a staged scene in which a bearded Orthodox Jewish man wearing a black hat stands on the steps outside his house and flags down a young black woman passing by.

They have this exchange:

Man: "Excuse me, ma'am? Hi. I need a big favour. My bedroom – the lights are on, so I was wondering if maybe you could come up to my bedroom and …"

Woman: "Are you crazy!? I ain't coming up to your bedroom!"

Man (nodding suggestively toward his open door): "Yeah but, the lights are on."

Woman (walking away): "You're crazy."

Rabbi Mordechai Hecht, a Chabad rabbi from Queens, N.Y., who appears in the Kosher Switch video says the controversy over its permissibility isn't just a fight over Jewish law. "There's politics in Halachah," he said. "The conversations they have are often money-related. Everyone has an agenda."

He said he can't endorse or reject the product because he's not a halachic authority.

"Is there one way in Halachah? Of course not. That's why the sages say, 'Make yourself a rabbi,'" Rabbi Hecht said. "I think the rabbis need to be brave. A conversation needs to be had, and maybe this is a good place to have it. If there's really a halachic issue, let's talk about it. This is an amazing invention. The question is, can it enhance the Shabbos?" ■

Classic Tolstoy story in ballet form

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina is intimidating; the tome is dense and complicated, but choreographer Boris Eifman's ballet is decidedly more straightforward.

St. Petersburg Eifman Ballet returns to Toronto's Sony Centre for the Performing Arts from April 23-25 for three performances of Anna Karenina. In it, Eifman focuses on the love triangle between three of the central characters: Anna, Vronsky and Karenin.

Eifman admits the play doesn't try to cover the entire, complex plot of the book. "I was concerned about the tragic story of a woman who was killed by the strongest erotic dependence on the man," Eifman said via email from Russia.

Eifman's ballet looks at the tragic choice Anna faces between following her desires and staying true to her marital duties. "While working on the performance I was interested mainly in the eternal inner conflict splitting the soul and psyche of the heroine," he writes.

Eifman, who was born in Siberia, started his company in 1977. Since then, he's toured extensively, becoming renowned both in Russia and internationally for his choreographic style and often lavish productions, many of which are based on pieces of literature. Thanks to his unique approach to the classical dance form, some call his genre the "psychological ballet." He also says he's been called a "choreographer-psychoanalyst." But Eifman doesn't focus on these titles.

Instead, "the creative mission is important" to him. Part of that means developing a "ballet language" to deal with life's complex philosophical issues. "One of the most important objectives for me," he writes, "is to take dance back into the course of psychological theatre. To make psychologism not the exclusive privilege of the drama but a fundamental principle of choreographic art."

Eifman's Anna Karenina debuted 10 years ago. Since then, he hasn't resisted the temptation to improve parts of it, making it more "harmonious and expressive." The scenery has been updated and the new principal dancers bring with them their own interpretations of Eifman's choreography.

Fans flock to Eifman's shows and he sells out in many international theatres – when Eifman Ballet first came to Toronto in 2013, the company played to a full house. Eifman thinks that's because dance is a universal language.

"A lot of things in this world today separate people, making them aggressive and intolerant to each other," he writes. "A ballet brings people together and helps them to find a common ground. This is the main reason of our art's success."

Eifman however, doesn't like to anticipate how patrons will interpret his ballets. "I cannot and do not want to predict the emotional reaction of the audience. It must be vivid, spontaneous," he writes. "I hope that the audience will be able to empathize with the characters as sincerely as I empathize with them." And with source material as rich and dramatic as Anna Karenina, that shouldn't be too hard. ■

St. Petersburg Eifman Ballet's Anna Karenina runs from April 23-25 at The Sony Centre for Performing Arts, 1 Front Street East. Tickets available at 1-855-872-SONY (7669) or www.sonycentre.ca.

RAISE THE ROOF TELLS STORY OF DESTROYED WOODEN SYNAGOGUE BROUGHT BACK TO LIFE

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival and the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation co-present the festival screening of Raise The Roof, with filmmakers Cary and Yari Wolinsky in attendance. This new American-Polish feature documentary tells the inspiring story of how a decimated wooden Polish synagogue is brought back to life and given a permanent home in the new Polin Museum of the History of Polish Jews in Warsaw.

Prior to their destruction by the Nazis, Poland was home to more than 200 wooden synagogues, including the synagogue in Gwozdziec. The film documents the efforts of Boston-based artists and professors Rick and Laura Brown and a team of students, traditional artisans and builders, who reconstructed Gwozdziec synagogue's complex painted roof. Using original methods and tools, the team vividly unveils the forgotten artistry, science and culture of Poland's Jewish architectural heritage.

Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. at Bathurst. Thursday, May 7, 6 p.m. Raise The Roof is one of about 110 films being showcased at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs April 30 to May 10 at various venues across the city. Details at tjff.com

Big Bang Theory writer premieres film at Hot Docs

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A look at the immigrant experience in Israel, a comedian's creative struggles and the making of a groundbreaking documentary are among the hottest tickets for North America's biggest non-fiction film festival.

The Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Festival – or Hot Docs, for short – will screen these titles from April 23 to May 3 in Toronto.

Of the 210 films at Hot Docs this year, 59 are Canadian productions or co-productions. Three from that list of national titles are comedies from Jewish Canadian directors.

Calgary-born comedy scribe Robert Cohen, of The Big Bang Theory and The Simpsons fame, will premiere his directorial debut, Being Canadian. In that film, Cohen returns to his homeland to ask many of the country's funniest comics – including Martin Short, Mike Myers and Seth Rogen – what it means to be Canadian.

At press time only limited tickets were available for Being Canadian's screenings on April 25 and 26.

Another national funnyman, Howie Mandel, is behind the camera with the film Committed. The doc focuses on Mandel's friendship with rising star Vic Cohen, an aspiring comedian struggling to find his creative voice.

Meanwhile, Toronto filmmaker Billie Mintz is a co-director of Jesus Town USA, having its international premiere on April 24. The film is about a religious Oklahoma community's annual re-enactment of the Passion Play. When the actor who plays Jesus Christ retires, the community has to search for a new performer.

Aside from lighter fare, Hot Docs will screen a few riveting Israel-set films.

"The goal for the festival is knowing the diversity of Toronto and the curiosity of Torontonians, not just in their own specific culture but to learn more about the world," says Hot Docs programmer Alexander Rogalski.

Censored Voices* is a must-see doc.

Jesus Town, top, and Mussa

> The goal for the festival is knowing the diversity of Toronto and the curiosity of Torontonians.

One of the festival's most intriguing titles is Beyond the Fear, an Israel co-production. The doc focuses on the relationship between Yigal Amir – the assassin of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin – and the woman he fell in love with during his prison sentence.

One must-see doc is the fascinating Censored Voices, which received rave reviews at Sundance earlier this year. Mor Loushey's film features exclusive audio clips with Israeli soldiers after the Six Day War in 1967.

Those recordings had been censored for many years, but are now available. The comments from Israeli soldiers are startling and insightful, exploring how the war corrupted these young men.

Another new film from Israel, Mussa, explores the struggle of a mute, 12-year-old Sudanese refugee living in Tel Aviv. The title character lives in squalor yet attends a private school.

Anat, Goren's doc, premiering on April 24, looks at one boy's perspective of Israeli economic disparity and the immigrant experience.

Meanwhile, Rogalski highly recommends Lanzmann, a 40-minute doc about director Claude Lanzmann and his experiences making the remarkable film Shoah. That nearly 10-hour doc about the Holocaust, released in 1985, took Lanzmann 12 years to make.

"His story relates to so many documentary filmmakers who dedicate their lives to sharing very difficult stories," Rogalski tells The CJN. "He didn't want to ignore so many important facets of [the Holocaust]. He needed to complete it for others."

Lanzmann's world premiere at Hot Docs will mark the 30th anniversary of Shoah.

Meanwhile, this year marks 10 years since the release of The Last Mogul, Barry Avrich's acclaimed doc about Hollywood studio head Lew Wasserman.

A screening on April 26 will celebrate the film's anniversary, and will be followed by a panel discussion with industry experts. ■

Hot Docs celebrates 10th anniversary of The Last Mogul

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Toronto filmmaker Barry Avrich began to prepare a documentary about Hollywood studio head Lew Wasserman, he got the chance to shake the mogul's hand at a party in Los Angeles. There, Avrich told Wasserman he planned to make a movie about the executive's six-decade career.

Wasserman's response: "Not while I'm alive, and not while I'm dead."

Avrich did not abide by the studio head's wishes. Regardless, his 2005 doc, The Last Mogul, became a stellar tribute to one of Hollywood's hungriest power players.

The director announced production in 2002, on the day Wasserman died. Avrich's doc then found critical praise and Oscar buzz during its time on the festival circuit in 2005. On April 26, the film celebrates its 10th anniversary with a retrospective screening at the Hot Docs festival in Toronto.

Even though the film is just a decade old, the industry has changed so drastically since the early 21st century that the doc feels like more of a period piece.

"How Lew operated could not possibly exist today," Avrich told The CJN from his office in Toronto. "If I were shooting [The Last Mogul] today, I'd have to shoot it against the backdrop of what the industry has become."

Unlike the Ivy League grads that Avrich says are at the helm of much of the film industry today, Wasserman didn't even have an MBA. Wasserman's reign included a great deal of influence in Washington, and he had close relationships with many presidents, including Ronald Reagan, a former actor.

The mogul's career spanned much of the rise and changing face of the Hollywood studio system.

Born to Jewish Russian immigrants in Cleveland, Wasserman grew up around gambling dens, speakeasies and vaudeville shows. He began his prosperous career as an usher for a local movie house and later worked as a publicity director for a casino.

Early in his career, he landed a job at the Music Corporation of America (MCA) as a booking agent. The young film lover left for Los Angeles in the late 1930s to work as the head of MCA's movie division.

Barry Avrich, top, and Les Wasserman.

"He came from a mobbed-up world where a deal was a handshake," Avrich says. "This was a guy who came from nothing, a street guy who just understood the art of the deal and power and knew where to find it."

One of Wasserman's greatest tactics in the business was how he packaged films. At MCA, he represented many A-list actors, musicians and filmmakers, giving him the power to pitch projects with several of the studio's clients.

He helped to negotiate better studio deals for many of these big-name stars, including Bette Davis, James Stewart and Judy Garland.

Twenty-five years later, working as an executive for Universal Studios, he helped to spawn the rise of the summer blockbuster with the box office behemoth Jaws.

Although one of the mightiest figures in Hollywood history, Wasserman was a very private, secretive man. He didn't own a cell phone and his desk was always clean, since he abhorred making notes and keeping records.

It is no wonder he was so cautious of people writing books and making films about him.

Even after Wasserman died, Avrich says he found it challenging to find powerful Hollywood figures and politicians to sit with him for an interview. Wasserman's widow, Edie, and grandson Casey tried to yield their influence to sabotage the production.

"I would literally be in the anterooms of power waiting with my crew, and Lew's grandson and widow were making phone calls and sending out emails, saying, 'This is unauthorized and you will not participate with him,'" Avrich says.

Despite doors slamming in Avrich's face, The Last Mogul boasts a stellar ensemble of talking heads, including Larry King, Suzanne Pleshette, MPAA president Jack Valenti, producer Robert Evans and former U.S president Jimmy Carter.

Industry opinion on the documentary has gotten warmer over time. Avrich received a rave review from Universal studio head Ron Meyer, who met with him at a private L.A. screening room to view the film.

Avrich says he believes Edie eventually saw the film. "Years after the film came out, friends of mine were at the Peninsula Hotel in Beverly Hills and she was by the pool with some friends having lunch," he tells The CJN.

"My friends introduced themselves to her and she said, 'You're from Toronto? A fine young man made a film about my husband from Toronto.'"

Since Mogul's release a decade ago, Avrich has made acclaimed documentaries about other industry power players like Harvey Weinstein and Garth Drabinsky.

After the anniversary screening at the TIFF Bell Lightbox on April 26, there will be a panel conversation with today's industry experts and moguls. None of them, Avrich insists, could compete with Wasserman's stature in the film industry.

"When I made The Last Mogul, the number one question people asked when we were shooting was, 'Is Lew Wasserman truly the last mogul?'" he says.

"Without a doubt. There couldn't be one powerful man like Lew ever again." ■

An interactive, choose-your-own adventure

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

There was a half hour period when I thought I might be losing it.

Wandering the labyrinthine halls of a dusty old school, I'd lost the people I came with and found myself slipping in and out of classrooms, auditoriums and shadowy passageways watching dozens of scenes simultaneously unfold between shifting, wraith-like characters clad in school uniforms.

One moment I stood with two or three other people in a science lab set in the 1920s watching a charged sexual encounter between a teacher and student, the next I was pressed into a cramped teacher's lounge engaged, for the second time in two hours, in a 1950s-era protest against gender-segregated classrooms.

Such was my experience of Brantwood 1920:2020, an innovative musical production put on by The Canadian Music Theatre Project, Sheridan College's musical theatre department.

Co-created by professional Toronto playwrights and directors Mitchell Cushman and Julie Tepperman and produced by Michael Rubinoff, Sheridan's dean of visual and performing arts, Brantwood is set in a recently-shuttered Oakville elementary school several blocks from Sheridan College.

Granted permission to use the empty building, Cushman and Tepperman conceived of a fictional high school – also called Brantwood – in which to set their immersive, three-hour play.

The premise is that Brantwood alumni –the audience – have been invited back for a final tour of their old school before it is torn down and converted into condos. But, as they gather on the school's lawn to watch Brantwood's principal and valedictorian unveil a time capsule buried by the class of 1920, a sort of rupture of the space-time continuum awakens the ghosts of students and teachers of the school's past 100 years, who eerily usher the audience inside the school.

What ensues is an interactive, choose-your-own-adventure-style experience wherein, at any given time, 15 distinct scenes are occurring in all corners of the school, acted by 40 actors playing a collective total of 100 characters.

The play includes 40 musical numbers and a smattering of dance sequences.

"Mitchell and I are both interested in pushing the boundaries of intimacy between performer and audience," Tepperman told The CJN.

She explained that they and Rubinoff were inspired to bring the kind of immersive, site-specific theatre embodied by the popular New York City play Sleep No More to a Toronto-area audience.

Brantwood* is an immersive, choose-your-own-adventure-style play spanning 100 years of the fictional school's history.

Brantwood's 11 storylines span the fictional school's history – from 1920 to 2020 – and the actors are constantly transitioning from one era to the next.

The effect is trippy – particularly when plots loop back around and you end up watching a scene you'd already seen part of happen a second time, only from a slightly different point in time or physical angle.

As scenes unfurl regardless of who – if anyone – is watching, I'd just as likely find myself alone with two characters in the midst of a tense confrontation, as in a crowded cafeteria watching an elaborate drug bust go down.

To capture the essence and angst of high school and the ethos of each decade, Cushman and Tepperman, who wrote 15 hours of script, left no stone unturned when it came to featuring the gritty, uncomfortable and, often, political, issues faced by teenagers throughout the ages.

Topics included race and gender-based discrimination, sexual assault, abortion, teen pregnancy, drugs and bullying.

One storyline, set in the late 1930s, involves several students starting a school "swastika club."

"We were interested to explore what a 15-year-old who sympathized with Nazi ideas might be like," Cushman said. "We wanted not to portray him as an evil genius but to look at his circumstances. In this case, the character's father was laid off and he's angry and finds meaning in these ideas."

Cushman and Tepperman hope to adapt Brantwood to a professional stage.

"We would love to be able to bring this show to Toronto. We feel like the market there could support it , and is ready for, a long-running, immersive production like Sleep No More," said Cushman. ■

Brantwood runs until May 3. Tickets can be purchased online at sheridancollege.ca or at the Theatre Sheridan Box Office, 1430 Trafalgar Rd. Oakville.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Not a love story

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In a few weeks, on the holiday of Shavuot, Jewish communities around the world customarily read the biblical book of Ruth.

Shavuot is a harvest holiday, so perhaps the custom arose because the action in Ruth takes place during the harvest season. Or perhaps Ruth's famous declaration to her mother-in-law, Naomi, seems appropriate for Shavuot, the holiday that commemorates the acceptance of the Torah by the Jewish People at Mount Sinai: "Do not urge me to leave you, to turn back and not follow you. For wherever you go, I will go; wherever you lodge, I will lodge; your people shall be my people, and your God my God." (Ruth 1:16)

At 85 verses, the book of Ruth is one of the shortest in the Bible. A readable and easily understandable short story, it has moving dialogue and a small cast of characters. In a certain sense, it's a story about the courtship and marriage of Ruth and Boaz, and the establishment of the family from which King David later descends.

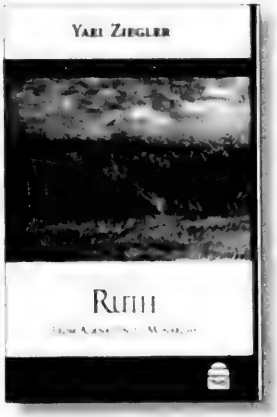
Yael Ziegler, a young Israeli Bible teacher from an American background, has now published a hefty volume (almost 500 pages) of analysis and commentary on the book of Ruth. Ziegler is a leading member of the cadre of modern religious Bible scholars in Israel who combine the best methods of literary analysis of the biblical text with a judicious sampling of midrashic interpretations by the classical rabbis.

She explains the logic of combining these two methods: "We have seen that hazal [the classical rabbis] often make observations similar to those made by modern scholars who employ literary tools."

She is acquainted with the writings of modern Bible critics, but her approach is not theirs.

Her fascinating analysis of the unusual courtship of the male and female protagonists, Boaz and Ruth, makes their relationship sound very modern in some ways, but not in others.

Building on the work of literary scholar Robert Alter (in The Art of Biblical Narrative), Ziegler shows how the first meeting of Boaz and Ruth follows the literary "type scene" of a couple who meet at a well and later marry. The first time Boaz meets Ruth, he is a wealthy landowner and she is gleaning in his field, as needy people did in ancient Israel. Boaz invites her to eat and drink: "When you are thirsty, go to the jars and drink some of [the water] that the men have drawn." (Ruth 2:9)



Ruth: From Alienation to Monarchy
by Yael Ziegler
Maggid Books

In many ways, their first meeting resembles that of Moses and Zipporah (Exodus 2:15-16), Jacob and Rachel (Genesis 29:9-10), or Abraham's servant, acting as Isaac's agent, and Rebecca (Genesis 24:17-19). In all four of these scenes, the meeting and the offer of water introduce the couple that will later marry.

But Ziegler outlines two significant differences in the Ruth story. As Alter had already noted, in the other stories, the match is initiated when the man travels to the woman's territory. Here, though, Ruth comes onto Boaz's turf, either accidentally or on purpose, to initiate the meeting. Ziegler then notes further that in this scene, nothing happens! The couple meet, an offer of drink is made, they exchange pleasant words, and they both go their own way.

Nothing happens, as Ziegler points out, until after Ruth, prompted by her mother-in-law, Naomi, realizes that further action is required. Ruth sets out to meet Boaz alone at night in what is, as Ziegler proves through careful language analysis, an attempt to seduce him.

Ziegler notes that both Ruth and Boaz had ancestors who played a role in such seduction scenes. Ruth's ancestor, Lot, was seduced by his own daughter, who was certain that the continuity of humanity depended on her actions. (Genesis 19:30-38) One of Boaz's ancestors, Tamar, seduced her father-in-law, Judah, again because she feared that the continuity of her late husband's line would cease. (Genesis 38:14-18) Ruth, too, sets off to seduce Boaz in order to preserve the line of her late husband.

> The narrative consciously and consistently avoids any indication of romantic involvment between Boaz and Ruth

Again, the differences are more important than the similarities. In the earlier stories, Lot and Judah slept with the woman who had seduced them, without knowing who she was. In our story, as soon as Boaz wakes up and finds a woman sleeping at his feet, he pointedly asks, "Who are you?" (Ruth 3:9) Ziegler argues convincingly that nothing sexual occurs between Boaz and Ruth that night, even though seduction was the original plan.

Ziegler adds that "the narrative consciously and consistently avoids any indication of romantic involvement between Boaz and Ruth."

The book of Ruth is a story of two exemplary people who both realize the sterling qualities of the other. (Boaz admires Ruth's kindness to her mother-in-law in Ruth 2:11-12; Ruth acknowledges Boaz's kindness to herself in 2:13.)

"The book of Ruth consistently eschews the customary biblical hints of love or romance between Ruth and Boaz. We find respect, admiration and gratitude, but not passionate feelings... The book of Ruth emphasizes that the relationship of Boaz and Ruth is founded on the willingness to fulfil their responsibilities, even at great personal expense."

As much as we might wish it to be a love story, Ziegler proves that it is not. But she brings the story to life in a readable style that should engage any interested reader of the Bible. ■

Cookbook serves up recipes from across the community

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's not often that one finds cerviche, matbucha, zacusca and chicken machmoosa in a single recipe book. But these international dishes can all be found in the Bathurst Street Kitchen: A Collection of Toronto Jewish Community's Go-To Recipes

This new Jewish cookbook, a compendium of recipes contributed by men, women and children from across the Greater Toronto Area, is an initiative of UJA Woman's Philanthropy and was published by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Many contributors turned out for the spring book launch, an elegant affair with live music, sparkling wine and hors d'oeuvres such as brisket bites and ceviche, all recipes from the cookbook.

What's unusual about the Bathurst Street Kitchen is the inclusion of archival photos of the Toronto Jewish community. Open the book and the first picture (circa 1938) one sees is of three bakers from Perlmutar's holding the 99-pound challah they prepared for the Hadassah Bazaar.

Elisa Palter, who co-chaired the cookbook committee with Karine Krieger, says that two years ago she was approached to head the project by Lori Rosenthal, a past chair of women's philanthropy. "She was looking for a hands-on project with a social component to develop outreach and camaraderie."

She thought a community cookbook would have wide appeal, recalls Palter. "Everybody loves to cook. The world is a foodie world."

The project generated a lot of enthusiasm. Between 500 and 600 people responded after word went out that the committee was looking for people's favourite recipes and the stories connected to them. "We asked for reliable recipes that were always a hit, and [asked] why they were go-to recipes. There are modern recipes but there are also many traditional recipes, which were passed down from one generation to the next

"We received an assortment of recipes from 25 different countries of origin –Morocco, Russia, Argentina, Mexico...It was quite an amazing list of places."

In the end, 300 recipes were chosen by the recipe collection committee chaired by Daniella Kuhl and they were reviewed by food writer Bonny Reichert and cooking instructor Carolyn Tanner-Cohen. Brenlee Gurvey Gales was the sales and marketing chair.

Palter says she and Krieger, along with committee vice-chairs Naomi Oelbaum and Lissie Sanders are grateful for all the help they received from the 100 volunteers who participated on the various committees, and for all the community support for the project.

The Bathurst Street Kitchen can be purchased through the UJA website (jewishtoronto.com/cookbook), a site where people can engage with others interested in food.

The books are also available online through Chapters and at Chapters stores.

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

What use is it to invoke the 'slippery slope'?

Dr. Michael Gordon

One of the commonly used terms to dissuade the public or policy-makers from pursuing a piece of legislation is the concept of the "slippery slope." The negative imagery is clear to most people, especially those living in northern climates. If you start sliding from the top, the forces of physics pre-determine that you will reach the bottom.

Slippery slopes sound as if they might not be good for the human species, although vast numbers of people seek them out, paying large sums of money to descend them, without anxiety about impending disaster.

For many seniors, slippery slopes, even minor ones are dangerous because of the risk of falls and fractures. What is fascinating is the number of public policy initiatives that have prompted critics to invoke the "slippery slope" argument to dissuade or frighten policy-makers and the public. Critics argue that a policy will ultimately negatively impact the population, society and culture, and the religious basis of a community will be endangered.

I recall hearing an academic rabbi warn that same-sex marriage threatens the foundation of families as we know them. Separate from his own religious views of such coupling, he expressed the fear that the impact on society would promote a "slippery slope" decline in heterosexual marriage and the essential societal basis of the family.

His decade-old prediction does not appear to have materialized in many jurisdictions in which same-sex marriage is now as ordinary as a Tim Hortons coffee and muffin.

A "slippery slope" warning was recently invoked in relation to the Canadian Supreme Court's decision to lift the ban on physician-assisted suicide (PAS). I have heard cries of despair, especially from religious physicians, from faith-based institutions of all denominations and from strongly religious politicians and ordinary citizens.

I vividly recall similar, impassioned warnings of the "slippery slope" when the state of Oregon passed its Dying with Dignity Act. But almost 20 years since the final version of the act passed in 1997, it is hardly a news story in that state anymore. There has been no rush to acquire self-destroying medications, nor has there been a massive movement into Oregon from elsewhere for PAS-seekers to receive lethal drugs from complicit physicians.

I have frequently been asked for my predictions of the impact of Canada's Supreme Court ruling. My reply is, "First, we have to see the federal and likely provincial take on the legislation and determine how it will affect each of us in our specific roles in the health-care system."

We should collectively pressure our governments for alternatives such as readily available exemplary palliative care to thwart the perceived need for PAS. For those unfortunately suffering, proper medical relief from physical and emotional symptoms through good palliative care should be a given.

Looking at many other PAS-allowing jurisdictions, physicians are not obligated to carry out PAS if they cite personal and/or religious reasons for opting out. There is nothing to suggest that faith-based health care institutions will be obligated to carry out PAS if it conflicts with the basic tenets of their religion, as has been the case for abortions, whether one agrees with such policies in publicly funded hospitals or not.

For those patients who may qualify for and request PAS under the carefully crafted guidelines (forthcoming from Canada's Parliament), there will generally be alternative sites they can turn to that have no intrinsic faith-based objection to PAS.

In Oregon, most of the patients who are provided with PAS receive the lethal medication in their own homes, surrounded by their families, in addition to the attending physician.

Invoking the "slippery slope" is not particularly compelling; the experience of time has demonstrated that it is usually an argument used to frighten people. It is evoked when good, empirical evidence is not readily available to demonstrate the basis of a true concern. So, let's put on our snow-grippers and learn to navigate "slippery slopes" in an analytical, empirical and historical perspective. ■

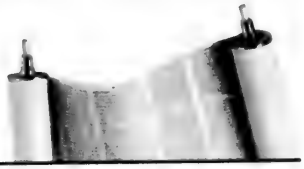
Tazria-Metzora | Leviticus 12:1-15:33



Yacov Fruchter examines what ritual sacrifice can teach us about childbirth
Rabbi Shalom Spira explores the halachic questions posed by circumcision
Rachael Turkienicz notes that tahor and tameh don't mean 'pure' and 'impure'

Yacov Fruchter

In Tazria, the first of the double parshiyot we read this week, we're introduced to a strange practice. After childbirth, a woman is required to bring a kor ban chatat, a sin offering. While I think connecting childbirth to ritual practice is powerful and important, similar to a bris or simchat bat being celebrated with the community in shul, it's hard to understand what "sin" the Torah could be referring to.

One approach is to reframe the chatat as not being connected to "sin," but rather to the korban brought following any ritual impurity as a way of returning to regular worship.

The Kli Yakar, a 16th-century sage, explains that in the throes of labour pains, it's natural for a woman to vow to never have sexual relations with her husband again as a way of avoiding future pain. Undoubtedly, he continues, after holding her baby in her arms, her heart is filled with joy and her pain is dulled, and she regrets making her vow. As such, the chatat is for not following through with her vow.

A different approach by the great teacher Nechama Leibowitz is quoted in the blog Torah Musings by Rabbi Gil Student.

"The new life within her made her deeply conscious of the greatness of the Creator, and also of her insignificance as 'dust and ashes' and impurity. Hence the need for a sin offering."

The Kli Yakar's answer emphasizes the power of childbirth and perhaps children in general as an unmatched source of joy and an instigator of love. On the other hand, Leibowitz sees it as a source of awe at the incredible power of God.

As we remember the birth pangs of the modern State of Israel on Yom Hazikron and celebrated its achievements and thank HaShem for the sheer miracle of its existence on Yom Ha'atzmaut, let us also find a way to recognize our collective mistakes and offer a chatat. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

By virtue of the fact that Leviticus 12:3 duplicates the mitzvah of circumcision already presented by Genesis 17:9-14, the Gemara (Shabbat 132a) derives that circumcision overrides the Sabbath. This license to desecrate the Sabbath applies both to the surgery, as well as to the subsequent therapeutic suctioning.

Accordingly, Mishnah Berurah (Orach Chaim 331, se'if katan 36) catalogues a dispute among the decisors whether an individual baby's surgery and suctioning can be orchestrated by separate people on the Sabbath, that is, a mohel and a motzetz acting in sequence. This dispute assumes heightened significance during today's HIV global pandemic.

Specifically, Rabbi J. David Bleich (Bioethical Dilemmas, Vol. 1, pp. 171-174) identifies an HIV-proof means of how to cleanse one's mouth prior to oral suctioning so as to protect the baby. The rinse consists of 151-proof rum (40 ounces) with 0.12 per cent chlorhexidine (0.24 ounces), swished for a full minute. In an audio-recorded 1991 lecture available at yutorah.org, Rabbi Bleich adds that the motzetz should immediately rinse his mouth with this recipe for another minute following the suctioning, to protect the motzetz from reverse-infection. Yet, the rinse is itself toxic, and so each time the motzetz must neither swallow it nor to allow it to contact his eyes or ears.

Given the complexity of this protocol, it seems clear that an independent motzetz is warranted. Thus, the permissibility of arranging such a high-tech circumcision on the Sabbath will ultimately hinge upon the controversy described by Mishnah Berurah. Assuming that the synagogue authority who supervises a circumcision is unable to resolve this dispute, two hypothetical alternatives would be to either allow ad hoc suctioning by way of a tube (analogous to Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, Iggerot Mosheh, Orach Chaim 2:105, who countenances Selichot before halachic midnight on an emergency basis), provided that an explanatory announcement is broadcast), or to postpone the circumcision. ■

Rachael Turkienicz

In this week's Torah portion, the text details conditions that get translated as "pure" and "impure." After childbirth you are "impure." Unexplained, pus-filled blisters make you "impure." The transition from impure to pure involves passage of time and immersion in a mikvah, a pool of natural running water.

The Hebrew words used for "pure" and "impure" are tahor and tameh. We do ourselves a great disservice by accepting the translation on face value without realizing the spiritual complexities involved. We associate "pure" with clean and "impure" with unclean. But in other parts of the text, we're told that when we touch holy objects, our hands become tameh, and certainly there is nothing unclean about a holy object.

Tahor and tameh are not indicative of purity and sin, or clean and unclean, but rather they are different states of being that reflect different ritual and relationship conditions. When a person is tahor, they are ritually open and all their interpersonal relationships flow. When a person is tameh, they are ritually closed and their relationships narrow to a small focus. Sometimes this can happen because we encounter things in the world, and sometimes it happens naturally with the ebb and flow of our bodies.

To transition from tameh to tahor, we watch the sun go down and we immerse ourselves into the earth, into the natural waters that flow and move. The waters of the mikvah return us to a balance of body and soul where we are again open spiritually to ritual and physically to our relationships.

In the modern world, we balk at what we consider to be outdated concepts, particularly when we speak of clean or unclean. But if we're able to broaden our thoughts toward the underlying concepts that speak of balance and imbalance and harmony of body and soul, we realize that, ancient or modern, Jewish values are timeless. ■

Matbucha

This recipe submitted by Hadassa Slater was given to her by Jewish Iraqi family friends

- ❑ 1 green pepper
- ❑ 1 to 2 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 3 garlic cloves, minced
- ❑ 1 small can diced tomatoes
- ❑ ¼ teaspoon chili flakes

Preheat oven to 350.

Slice the green pepper in half and roast in the oven until the skin darkens. Cool and slide the skin off. Cut into cubes about the same size as the diced tomatoes. In a skillet, heat the olive oil on low and add tomatoes. Once the liquid has evaporated, add the green peppers and cook for five minutes longer. Add garlic and cook an additional 2 minutes. Season to taste with chili flakes. Serve cold or at room temperature. Makes 8 servings.

Ceviche A La Mexicana

Submitted by Sandra Frydman de Helfant

- ❑ 1 lb. halibut, cut into ½-in. cubes
- ❑ 2 cups fresh lemon or lime juice
- ❑ 1 white onion, chopped
- ❑ 1 hot green chili, finely chopped (optional)
- ❑ ½ bunch coriander, chopped
- ❑ ½ lb. ripe tomato, chopped
- ❑ 1 tbsp. orange juice
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 large avocado, sliced (for garnish)

Place fish and lemon/lime juice in a glass bowl. Make sure fish is well covered by juice and marinate in the refrigerator a minimum of two hours or overnight. Pour into a colander and drain juice. In a large bowl, mix fish with all remaining ingredients, except the avocado. Taste and adjust salt as necessary. Cover and refrigerate two more hours. Serve in a large or individual bowls and garnish with avocado. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Chicken Machmoosa and Fried Chickpeas

Rochelle Chester and Melanie Zeldman

Our father is from Poland and our mother was born in India, but her family was originally from Iraq and lived there for many generations.

We grew up in an Ashkenazi household in every way ritually, except for the food that our mother cooked. When we were little, we didn't always love our mother's unusual cooking!

As we got older and especially after our mother passed away, we started to long for those familiar smells and tastes of our childhood. These two dishes may be served together or separately. Enjoy!

Chicken machmoosa:

- ❑ 1 lb. ground chicken
- ❑ 1 large onion, chopped
- ❑ 1 tbsp. fresh ginger, chopped
- ❑ 1 garlic clove, minced
- ❑ 1 tbsp. turmeric
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 2 tbsp. oil for frying

Fried chickpeas:

- ❑ 1 can chickpeas, drained and rinsed
- ❑ 1/2 cup green onions, chopped
- ❑ 1/2 tbsp. ground cumin
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 2 tbsp. oil for frying

Combine ground chicken with other ingredients and fry in oil until chicken is cooked. Add additional spices to taste.

Combine chickpeas, onions and seasonings. Fry in oil until chickpeas soften. Add additional spices to taste. Serve with basmati or plain rice. Number of servings: 4 to 6. ■

Rabbi Jair Melchior: Jewish life will continue in Europe

plungen@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Jair Melchior, 32, is the latest in a long line of chief rabbis. His grandfather and great-grandfather were each the chief rabbi of Denmark, and his father, former member of Knesset Rabbi Michael Melchior, served as chief rabbi of Norway. The younger Rabbi Melchior, who was brought up in Israel, currently serves as chief rabbi of Denmark, a country that is home to 6,000 to 10,000 Jews. He will participate via Skype in a forum on the future of European Jewry at Toronto's Beth Tikvah Congregation on April 26. He spoke to The CJN by telephone.

Do you think there is a future for Jews in Europe?

There is a future for Jews in Europe. I believe they will want to stay. We have today Jews all over the world. There is no reason to see Jewish existence in Europe disappear. It won't be as in the past, of course, going back to the glorious past of European Jewry. I find that very hard to imagine. But Jewish life in Europe exists, and in some countries just as it did before.

Why are people questioning the future of European Jewry?

I think there is a mixture of a few things. First of all, people remember a time where European Jewry was much more important and larger. So they see it goes down and think it will disappear, and that's not the necessary conclusion.

After the Holocaust, many Jews left. But we also see the opposite: Jews moving back to Germany and Jews moving around Europe.

The other thing is that all the talk about anti-Semitism and attacks against Jews blames Muslim immigrants, but it's very dangerous and very wrong of people to talk this way. We recognize that there is a problem and a danger, but it is still not very high. The vast majority of Muslims in Europe are not a danger to Jews in any way. When we look at numbers of Muslims and conclude that they will all be against Europe and against the Jews, I think this represents a mix of prejudice and fear that doesn't have a connection to real life in Europe.

So the problems facing Jews in Europe are both internal – Jews don't want to practise Judaism – and external, discrimination or intimidation?

I think the main challenge for Jewish life in Europe is the interest to continue Jewish life. You have in some countries, more than others, assimilation, but there are many places where young people have become active. I just don't see a reason to paint a complete picture of all of Europe. Yes, there are challenges, but there are challenges to all Jewish communities, including in the United States. Some challenges have to do with security, some challenges have to do with Jewish identity.

I think the main thing has to do with how Jewish identity will be stronger. It's a challenge of choice. People can actually choose to be Jews. In the past, no one asked Jews if they wanted to be Jews or not.

What is the situation for Jews in Denmark?

The main challenge is the identity challenge. How will it be part of Jewish children's lives in the future? The generations have changed. We don't have as many religious people as before. Many of the strong families who helped the community for the last 200 to 300 years have left Denmark for Israel. But you have a lot of Jews who have stayed here. It means it will change the way the community looks. Where it will go, I'm not sure.

The very big issue we have here is circumcision. I don't see a ban happening in the near future. It is a danger that if something like this happens, it will threaten the existence of the Jewish community here.

Why is this being raised? And aren't there also some European countries that have banned schchitah?

In Denmark, they did that last year, but we didn't have shchitah before, because we are too small a community. We import our meat.

The reason is a lot of secularization of Europe. People can't understand how religion can be so important in people's lives. They see circumcision as a religious rite that contradicts the free will of the child. People need to have a deeper understanding of what religious freedom is. We don't have many politicians who want to ban circumcision, because they understand the issue in a way that normal people in the street can't.

We hear that many Jews are planning to leave France. They don't see a future for themselves in Europe.

The French situation is very different than the Danish one. The French Jews are much more traditional and Sephardi-oriented. They are much less assimilated than in Denmark. There is a much larger Muslim community in France. It's around 10 to 11 per cent of the population.

There's a lot of talk about immigration, but the numbers don't support this talk so much. Also, no one talks about Jews who come back to France, who move to Israel for a few years and who find out how difficult it is to live economically and who move back to France. This also exists, and the numbers are surprisingly large.

So, it exists, but much less than people talk about in the media.

Rabbi Jair Melchior. JULIA & PAVEL PHOTOGRAPHY

Isn't there a reason for reports of French Jews leaving – the Charlie Hebdo massacre, the kosher supermarket attack, the killings in Toulouse?

We also had an attack in Denmark two months ago.

So is this not something that worries the average French Jew and leads them to consider leaving Europe?

There are people who think about it, but it doesn't make up as big a part of people's lives as it seems. In France, have been quite a few attacks in the last few years, but it's still more dangerous to be in Israel. You could be hit by a terror attack.

So are you saying that people's fears are not rational?

You have people with some fear. I just lost a friend. I know the real danger that exists here, but it exists everywhere else in the world. The numbers are not that high, if you look back in history.

But isn't the trend pretty bad for the Jews? Twenty years ago, no one was talking about leaving western Europe?

In Denmark over the last few decades, the number of Jews who have left has gone down.

There is a change happening here, and it's happening in the rest of Europe. It's coming to a new balance. I'm not sure what will happen in the future, but I don't see a reason to say Jews will disappear or anything like that, definitely not because of terrorism. There have been attacks on Jews over the last 50 years. We had an attack on the synagogue in 1985 in Paris. It's not a new phenomenon in Europe that Jews are attacked, but it happens much less than in the far past.

There are reports that Jews can't walk wearing a kippah in some neighbourhoods without being threatened, spit upon and insulted, and they don't feel safe.

I think people exaggerate. I go with a kippah everywhere. More people go today with a kippah eveywhere than 40 years ago. It's not that you don't have rising attacks, cursing and spitting and hitting. These things happen, yes. But these are things that can change when social conditions change. The majority of these attacks are in difficult neighbourhoods with social problems. When these problems are solved, the violence will disappear, too.

Usually, the people who perpetrate these attacks are youngsters who just want to pick on someone, so they pick on homosexuals, on Jews or whomever they can see who is different.

And you have a specific problem with people from Palestinian backgrounds who have a deep hatred of Zionism, and they combine Zionism and Judaism. If you solve the situation in the Middle East between Palestinians and Israel, the same day you will solve the problem of anti-Semitism in Europe. The same day.

What is the situation of Jews in Germany?

Germany has had the fastest growing Jewish community in the world over the last 20 years. You have 20,000 Israelis living in Berlin. And you have Jews from other places moving to Germany. It's a rising Jewish community. In Europe, people move around. It happens all over Europe.

Does the European media's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict play a role in people's attitudes to Jews in Europe?

It does. It's one of those things that many people are angry about. There's a lot of anti-Israel sentiment. In Denmark it's better than in other countries. It comes from a very deep human rights point of view.

The Scandinavian countries were also the most supportive for Israel in the beginning, because they are so occupied about human rights issues. They became very anti-Israel because of the conflict with the Palestinians. They take the Palestinian side, usually, and that's an issue in Scandinavia.

Does that spill over into anti-Jewish attitudes?

From the Muslim community, it does. They don't make a distinction.

So your overall message is...?

There will be incidents, but Jewish life will continue in Europe. ■

Early 20th century missionary group sparked a riot

Backstory

BILL GLADSTONE

Having recently marked its 25th anniversary, Jews for Judaism continues to counter the activities of missionary groups in Toronto that deceptively target Jews for conversion.

Christian missions to the Jews are certainly nothing new here. In the era before World War I, a time when Toronto's Jewish community was burgeoning with new arrivals, the words of one particular missionary, Rev. Shabetai Benjamin Rohold, sparked a riot in the Ward, the city's principal Jewish district.

A yeshiva-educated Jew who had converted, Rev. Rohold was the son of the Chief Rabbi of Jerusalem. He had arrived in Toronto in 1908 to head the Presbyterian Church's proposed "Mission to the Jews", having run a similar mission in Glasgow for years.

Rev. Rohold spent a month visiting Jewish homes, shops, synagogues and institutions. Then, using the generous funding designated by the church, he opened the mission on the southwest corner of Bay (Teraulay) and Elm streets. It provided a free medical dispensary with a trained nurse, a night school with English classes, a nursery, reading room, employment service, boys' club, children's choirs and sewing classes. It also offered gospel services, Bible classes, and prayer meetings with free Sunday morning breakfasts.

Although attendance was high, conversions were few. While the second annual Seekers After Truth Society supper attracted a mixed audience of some 200 Jews and Christians (probably the latter in the majority), in its first two years the mission had converted only six women and two men. Still, when the Teraulay Street premises became overcrowded, the church built a new and much larger mission at Elm and Elizabeth. The new premises even boasted a gymnasium and athletic rooms.

No question that the mission helped many a Jewish family in desperate straits. With excellent knowledge of both Hebrew and Yiddish, Rev. Rohold personally took newly arrived Jewish men seeking employment to various businesses where he had friends, often finding them jobs.

The actions of Rev. Rohold and other local missionaries drew a strong counter-reaction from the Jewish community. A free medical dispensary was launched, a rabbi opened an anti-missionary headquarters near the Presbyterian mission, and plans sprouted for a Jewish athletic club.

There is also no question that the missionaries had become a major irritant. One stationed himself daily outside the home of Rabbi Yosef Weinreb until the latter obtained an injunction from City Hall. Another callously remarked to the press that Jewish homes were just like saloons on Sundays for the amount of liquor consumed, prompting a flurry of angry letters to the editor. In response to complaints that Rev. Rohold was proselytizing schoolchildren, he was barred from the grounds of the local Elizabeth Street and McCaul Street schools. Some candidates for municipal office had even promised the Jews that the missionaries would be put off the streets.

The tension seemed to boil over on the evening of Sunday June 18, 1911, otherwise a pleasant summer evening with the sidewalks filled with people. According to newspaper reports, three speakers – a Zionist, a socialist, and a missionary – had stationed themselves at various corners of the intersection at Dundas and Elizabeth streets.

When someone began translating the missionary's anti-Jewish slurs into Yiddish, the crowd became agitated. According to reports, people began throwing things and a melee broke out. Soon more than a thousand people jammed the intersection. Although a battalion of police officers came running from a nearby police station with their batons at the ready, the riot persisted for three hours and resulted in numerous injuries and arrests.

Over the next few days the newspapers carried various articles and letters in which each side blamed the other. Rev. Rohold asserted that while his religious faith obliged him to target the Jews, no one was obliged to listen to him. Despite the dramatic confrontation, missionary activities continued as before.

Rev. Rohold, who left for Jerusalem in 1920, had been only one of several formerly Jewish missionaries in Toronto in that era. Another was Morris Zeidman, founder of the Scott Mission – but that's another story. ■

New release in Vaughan's million-dollar community

The builders of Upper West Side are excited to announce an all new phase of luxury homes in Vaughan's prestigious estate community, located at Bathurst Street and Major Mackenzie Drive.

This new release features an elite collection of 41-foot and 50-foot homes on traditional depth lots. With many greenbelt, pie-shaped, crescent, cul-de-sac and parkside lots available, you can come home to a world of vibrant natural beauty at Upper West Side. With homes priced from just under $1 million, interested homebuyers can own first in Phase 2 by registering today at uwscommunity.com.

Brought to you by distinguished builders Aspen Ridge Homes, CountryWide Homes, Regal Crest Homes, The Conservatory Group and Townwood Homes, Upper West Side offers the finest community setting in all of Vaughan. This rich natural paradise features a branch of the Don River and prime conservation lands along its western border. A beautifully landscaped community pond offers the ideal place to sit, relax and enjoy the beauty of the great outdoors.

The homes at Upper West Side offer a standard of architectural distinction that is without rival. Each of the stunning home designs was crafted with the overall community aesthetic in mind, contributing to the kind of exquisite atmosphere that can only be achieved through the pursuit of an inspired creative vision.

Every lot was carefully paired with the home design that would best reflect the beauty of its surrounding landscape. The homes have also been thoughtfully incorporated into architecturally controlled streetscapes that celebrate the beauty of each individual home while contributing to a stunning overall aesthetic. The homes themselves feature a variety of architectural styles – classic, timeless designs reminiscent of the grand avenues of Forest Hill and Rosedale, and bold contemporary creations featuring an innovative blend of brick, stone and stucco materials. These are homes of remarkable beauty, with stone facades, grand porticoes and countless other exquisite exterior and interior details combining to create truly majestic residences. Offering Upper Thornhill's best selection of designs, a home that reflects your own personal standard of excellence awaits you at Upper West Side.

Upper West Side is ideally located to take advantage of the many pleasures of life in Vaughan. The community's family-friendly location in the heart of Upper Thornhill makes it easy to walk to schools, places of worship and parks within the broader residential community without ever having to cross major streets. There's also an abundance of shopping nearby on Yonge Street at places such as the Richmond Centre and Hillcrest Mall, not to mention a whole host of other impressive shops and restaurants close at hand.

Golf enthusiasts are certain to be pleased with the abundance of nearby courses such as Eagle's Nest Golf Club, Maple Downs Golf Course and Summit Golf and Country Club. Orchard Point offers cottage tranquility Orchard Point Harbour is a prime example of the trend towards resort-style living. Nestled on 500 metres of prime waterfront at the Narrows between Lake Simcoe and Lake Couchiching in Orillia, these prestigious residences offer the tranquillity of the cottage lifestyle with the conveniences of an urban condominium.

Characterized by its sophisticated design, first-class amenities and panoramic views, this is ideal for empty nesters and those looking to downsize. In addition, it is a desirable vacation property for those seeking the lakeside lifestyle without the hassles associated with maintaining a stand-alone property. Conveniently, Orchard Point Harbour is only an hour's drive from most points in the GTA, so you'll spend more time in your personal oasis and not in your car.

No detail has been overlooked. All suites in Phase Two offer breathtaking views of Lake Simcoe, and luxury finishes are standard throughout. Suites feature granite countertops, stainless steel appliances, engineered plank and porcelain tile flooring, gourmet kitchens, lavish bathrooms, and sliding glass doors onto a generous terrace or balcony. The condo buildings feature timber and stone accents to blend with the surrounding natural landscape. You'll appreciate the heated underground parking, and the welcoming designer-decorated lobby with fireplace and seating.

Orchard Point Harbour offers a selection of penthouses with spectacular views and the upscale finishes offered in the regular suites, plus premier kitchen cabinetry, solid-stone countertops, 10-foot ceilings and much more. A collection of Lakeside suites are also on offer, with premium features.

The comprehensive roster of amenities at Orchard Point Harbour include: the Lakeside Club, a fitness centre at the water's edge complete with a pool, hot tub, sauna, and yoga studio. The rooftop terrace and lounge are great for entertaining, with unparalleled views of Lake Simcoe. Boaters will appreciate the on-site Starport Marina, making it easy to explore the Trent-Severn Waterway, the Great Lakes, and beyond.

Orchard Point Harbour is minutes away from the charming city of Orillia by car or boat, offering quaint boutique shops, cafes, restaurants, theatres, and a full-service hospital. For an exciting night out, Casino Rama, with its gaming tables and big-name concerts, is 10 minutes away. There's plenty for outdoor lovers too. The area is a four-season playground with ski resorts, golf courses, walking trails, and parks.

Planning to dock your boat at Orchard Point Harbour? There are many exciting boating destinations, including nearby Mara Provincial Park, which is a short four-minute boat ride from your marina slip. There you can enjoy pristine beaches, swimming, camping, and other recreational activities.

Visit the new sales centre now under construction in Orillia, featuring a scale model, detailed renderings, Phase Two floor plans, kitchen and ensuite vignettes as well as examples of the various finish choices that will enable you to customize your suite.

Phase Two suite sales will launch this spring with a selection of one- or two-bedroom suites, ranging in size from 800 to 2,000-square-feet plus and starting from the low $300,000s. Occupancy is slated for summer 2017. ■

The Barrington Condominium Flats

At The Barrington Condominium Flats, right on the subway at Bathurst and St. Clair, Lash Group of Companies and The Goldman Group have introduced new suite designs and pricing to offer expanded opportunities to live in luxury overlooking scenic Forest Hill. Like the highly successful 500, 530 and 743 St. Clair Avenue West condominiums they developed nearby, this dynamic duo have a unique insight into the urban chic that permeates this prestigious residential area.

Within blocks, suite owners at The Barrington will also be able to access intriguing boutiques and trendy eateries including Catch Restaurant and The Stockyards. On Christie Street, the dynamic community hub, Artscape Wychwood Barns, offers culture, cuisine, urban agriculture, plus a variety of activities and events. The area around The Barrington is also dotted with libraries, parks, trails, bike lanes and a multitude of services. With a Walk Score of 98 and a Bike Score of 88, this address offers the convenience, health and environmental benefits of walking and biking to shop, dine and run errands.

Ideally located at 1486 Bathurst St., The Barrington is steps to the St. Clair West subway, meaning residents can make the trip to downtown Toronto in less than 30 minutes. The building is on four streetcar and bus routes as well.

In the midst of it all, The Barrington will inject a fresh, contemporary architectural flair. Designed by El Richmond Architects, the 18-storey tower's striking exterior will frame stylish interiors appointed by Tanner Hill and Associates. A sophisticated tone is set in the lobby, where residents and guests can access attentive executive concierge. On the fifth floor, an elegant multi-purpose room has a catering kitchen and dining area, and the terrace features seating areas, barbecues and outstanding city and lake views. The lounge area encompasses billiards and a large multi-media wall. For the ultimate in convenience, The Barrington's parking facility houses an automobile elevator (a first in Toronto) that maximizes space and minimizes energy consumption.

To accommodate the needs of diverse purchasers, The Barrington Condominium Flats offers two new suite groupings: The London Flats and The Knightsbridge Collection. Features and finishes include nine-foot ceilings, deep baseboards, pre-engineered hardwood flooring, porcelain tiles, spa-inspired bathrooms and kitchens with sleek modern cabinetry, under-valance lighting, granite or quartz counters and stainless steel appliances. Every suite also has at least one balcony or terrace.

The Barrington's 93 suites offer layouts of one, two and three bedrooms, in sizes from 555 to 2,200 square feet. Prices start from the low $300s.

Lash Group of Companies and The Goldman Group offer the peace of mind that comes with longevity. These family-owned firms boast more than a century of combined experience, having developed residential, commercial and industrial projects in Toronto and the United States. A nest of their own

The Nest is over 70 per cent sold. There are still some great options available. Units range from 464-square-feet one-bedrooms starting at $256,900, to 1,100-square-feet two-bedrooms+den into the $600,000s. Maintenance fees are 53 cents per square foot and include unlimited high speed Internet access.

For almost 60 years, The Rockport Group of companies has been engaged in the development, construction, sales and management of quality residential, commercial and industrial properties.

Rockport pioneered the condominium concept in Ontario. Jack Winberg, CEO, says, "my father was the first ever to register a condo in the city, in 1968."

Following in his father's innovative footsteps, Winberg and now his son Daniel, demonstrate this type of forward thinking in Rockport's new project, The Nest, in the emerging, hip, midtown Toronto neighbourhood of Hillcrest Village.

To be completed by the fall of 2016, The Nest is just right for singles, young families and empty nesters. This nine-storey midrise is a new project on St. Clair Avenue West, with 122 suites ranging from one-bedroom suites to two bedrooms plus den.

Street appeal is the result of the building's design of unique stepped stacked glass boxes with a distinctly geometric sensibility. Most suites will have balconies or terraces that are six-feet wide. "Anything less and you can't put a table and two chairs out there," Winberg says. The terraces and balconies will also have gas hookups for barbecues, eliminating the need for residents to awkwardly "schlep" propane tanks onto elevators and down hallways, he adds. "Because who wants to do that?"

"At Rockport, we are completely focused on the needs of our customer, learning what our customer wants and values in a home and then striving to exceed expectations through excellence in design, construction and finishes. The Nest is the result of this process, the best possible combination of features and prices for this neighbourhood."

This desire to exceed expectations is demonstrated in the building's amenities, sure to appeal to singles and young families. There is a beautiful indoor entertainment space for hosting parties, and a cool outdoor roof-top lounge with a fire pit, fully equipped kitchen, and barbecues for residents to enjoy the view, socialize and hang out. This 'green' building is built with geothermal heating and cooling and other sustainable features including an innovative fibre cement panel cladding.

Winberg says, "We know that in the long term these innovations will save owners money and enhance the value of their property."

The Nest also offers other thoughtful and surprising amenities that are sure to be appreciated. Every unit has unlimited high speed Internet included in the maintenance fees. Additional concierge services can be accessed through a smartphone app, in which you can arrange to take care of dry cleaning, shoe repair and other errands through a conveniently located locker drop off and pick up. A doggy spa on the main floor means residents with dogs can wash off paws and coats, so Fido doesn't track mud inside.

Winberg says, "I and other parents I know, want to help our kids to buy their first home. Hillcrest Village is a great neighbourhood to consider. Lots of young Jewish families are already moving in, attracted to the neighbourhood's youthful energy and proximity to amenities they want, including the new Leo Baeck campus which is just down the street. The Nest is an amazing investment opportunity for parents who want to help give their kids a start." ■

Gluckstein guides new home buyers

SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Trying to figure out what to do with a new house?

One of the best in the business has some tips for you.

Brian Gluckstein of Gluckstein Design, who is internationally recognized as one of the top 35 designers in the world by Interior Design Journal, sheds some light on a number of key topics, including matching a buyer with their ideal dwelling.

"You look at a few things," Gluckstein said. "You look at the style of the environment, whether it's modern or traditional, and you take into account the style of the structure, because that often dictates a great deal. And then, you look at the personality of your client.

"Are they young or old? Adventurous or traditional?" Gluckstein added. "You see what's going to be comfortable for them, what's going to reflect their lifestyle, and so you do an evaluation of the clients and their spaces.

"And then from there, we come up with a design proposal that usually is right on...a marriage of design and client."

As an interior designer, Gluckstein gets involved far before the finishing touches.

"Usually, we'll start when the house is in the design stages," Gluckstein said. "With a condo or house, we usually get involved in the design stages, before it's been built."

Being a part of the process that early pays dividends later.

"When you do a new house, you really want to work on the layout of the house," Gluckstein said. "We're involved before construction, so we're part of that initial team and we often have a great deal of involvement in the layout of the house or condo.

"It's important for us to be involved in the beginning because of the electrical plans, shapes and sizes of rooms, and all the finishes and designs, [which are] all very important," Gluckstein added. "We're really involved in the planning of the spaces."

Legacy Park celebrates grand opening at Thornhill City Centre

Among Liberty Development Corporation's most successful multi-phase condominium projects is the celebrated Thornhill City Centre, a master-planned residential community on Bathurst Street, just south of Highway 407.

With nine condo towers and 60 townhomes, already occupied since the community was first launched a decade ago, Liberty has released Thornhill City Centre's final phase, a 25-storey condo building called Legacy Park.

To celebrate the grand opening of Legacy Park, and welcome first-time buyers to the community, Liberty Development recently hosted a unique first-time buyer seminar. With hundreds in attendance, the event featured insightful comments from a panel of industry experts including Andrew Brethour, of PMA Brethour Realty Inc.; Greg Tucci, from Falconeri, Munro, Tucci LLP; and Renata Issakova, a mobile mortgage specialist from TD Bank.

First-time buyers explored the sales centre and learned about Legacy Park's distinctive architecture (by the award winning Kirkor Architects), amazing amenities, and its well designed, large suites, which range from 563 to 968 square feet (from one-bedroom to two-plus-den layouts).

Amenities at Legacy Park will include a state-of-the-art fitness facility, as well as a sauna and whirlpool for residents to relax and unwind. Other features and amenities will include a party room with sleek lounge-style seating and a modern bar, a media room and a golf simulator.

Legacy Park will overlook the community's centrepiece, a five-acre lush green oasis named Thornhill Green, the City of Vaughan's first urban park. Offering the ultimate in "green" living, Legacy Park will raise the bar in sustainability, with environmentally friendly features such as the beautifully landscaped roof top terrace.

Located just north of the fashionable Promenade Centre and the dynamic new shopping plazas along Centre Street, Legacy Park at Thornhill City Centre is conveniently located just minutes from public transit via VIVA, York Region Transit and the TTC.

With quick access to public transit, getting around the region will be easy, while Legacy Park's proximity to Highways 407, 400 and the 404 will make it easy to get just about anywhere in the GTA.

"While we celebrated the launch of Legacy Park with first-time buyers, this is a community that appeals equally to those looking to downsize," says Liberty Development's senior vice-president and general counsel, Marco Filice.

"It has something for everyone. A prime location, iconic architecture and a range of dynamic lifestyle features, Legacy Park promises to be one of the most successful launches, in one of our most successful communities." ■

For your chance to live at Legacy Park, visit the sales centre at 7890 Bathurst St. today to view the model suite, go to www.legacyparkcondos.com, call 905-731-8302 or email info@legacyparkcondos.com.

Pointers for buying a new home

Gluckstein, who was named Canada's favourite interior designer by Canadian House and Home, typically loves what he's working on at the moment.

"I think your current projects are always your favourite projects," Gluckstein said. "You're trying new things, so it's always the projects of the moment which are fun projects."

But what was his most beloved job ever?

"I could never tell you my all-time favourites, because then what would the other people think?" said Gluckstein with a chuckle.

Although Gluckstein does enjoy working at the cutting edge of design, he warns buyers about getting too caught up in the current times.

"I think that there are always a lot of trends and I always say that you don't want to do any of the permanent elements too trendy," Gluckstein said. "If a certain colour is popular right now, I'd restrict that to accessories or paint.

"Where you have to be much more thoughtful about the longevity of things is when you're doing the permanent parts of the house, like the floor, kitchen, bathroom, things like that."

That being said, there are popular current options that should hold up well into the future.

"We're seeing a lot of light-coloured reclaimed floors, wood floors that have a taupe grey wash to them, [as] a big trend right now," Gluckstein said. "It's not something that's trendy, because we've seen it in Europe for centuries, but it's come to Canada and it's very serviceable because it wears very well. [Some more] big moves are towards free-standing tubs in the bathrooms, and in kitchens, we're seeing cabinetry looking more like furniture and not all matching," Gluckstein added. "As well, home gyms are big trends now, [ones]that have exercise areas, massage rooms, saunas, steams, and whirlpools.

"It's the whole idea of wellness, exercise, and fitness, but in a very sophisticated way." ■

Skinnamarink singer remembered, and court nixes violent agunah solution

Lois Lilienstein was part of famed trio

Lois Lilienstein of the internationally famed children's singing group Sharon, Lois and Bram, died April 22 in Toronto at age 78 of a rare form of cancer. The trio, perhaps best known for their signature song Skinnamarink, formed in 1978. Their TV series The Elephant Show ran on CBC from 1984 to 1989. A second series, Skinnamarink TV, ran for 52 episodes in the late 1990s. The group received the Order of Canada in 2002. Born Lois Goldberg in Chicago, she came to Canada in 1966 when her husband became a sociology professor at York University. She stopped touring with the group in 2000.

Rabbis guilty in get kidnapping case

The problem of agunot, women whose husbands won't grant them a get (a religious divorce), is serious, but apparently not serious enough to warrant kidnapping, a U.S. court ruled last week. Three Orthodox U.S. rabbis were convicted in Trenton, N.J., of conspiracy over a scheme to force Jewish men to grant gets to their wives by kidnapping them. A jury debated for three days after a two-month trial in the case of Rabbi Mendel Epstein, 69, of Lakewood, N.J., Rabbi Jay Goldstein, 60, and Rabbi Binyamin Stimler, 39, both of Brooklyn, N.Y. They were part of a group that kidnapped men and used violence, including beatings and stun guns, until they agreed to give gets. The ring was caught in an FBI sting in 2013 in which agents posing as a Jewish woman and her brother sought its services.

Rivlin and Bibi spurn Carter

Israeli President Reuven Rivlin and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu have reportedly rejected invitations to meet with former U.S. president Jimmy Carter after consulting with Israel's Foreign Ministry and National Security Council. An unnamed senior Israeli official said the recommendation not to meet Carter was due to his "anti-Israeli stance" in recent years, including his strong criticism during last summer's Gaza conflict. Israel did, however, approve his request to visit Gaza. Carter, who is slated to visit Israel in the coming weeks, has planned meetings with other Israeli and Palestinian leaders. ■

The beauty of a group

I would like to express my disappointment and disbelief that an article in The CJN would insult group bat mitzvahs ("Celebrating an individual bat mitzvah," April 16). In fact, the article went so far as to question "how significant a Jewish component could [a girl] perform when there were 10 other girls celebrating alongside her?"

Clearly, the author didn't attend the Akiva School group bat mitzvah held last month at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim. That event was where my own daughter, Nicole, celebrated her special Jewish moment. This beautiful event featured 20 amazing girls, each with their own parshah, and learning from Lisa Steinmetz, director of Jewish learning at Akiva School.

What if my family could not afford our own bat mitzvah and only if we took part in a group could it happen? What if my daughter felt more comfortable in a group? Is she less of a Jew and is the milestone less significant?

I had my bar mitzvah at the Shaar Hashomayim, and now my daughter celebrated her bat mitzvah on the same bimah 29 years later. It was a magical event.

However Jews choose to follow their religious beliefs and commemorate special events, whether individual or in a group, whether in a synagogue, a hotel, or a home, it is their choice and it's just as important and memorable.

How to remember the Shoah

The juxtaposition of rabbis discussing how to memorialize the Shoah and the essay of Shireen Afzal ("Genocides still happen, and I'm sick of indifference," April 16) was as dramatic as it was appropriate.

The rabbis recognized that if it's not ritualized and doesn't lead to action, memorializing simply will not lead to a change in humanity's behaviour.

Then we turn the page and read an essay from a teenager who is committing herself to that very thing, action, by using her writing talents to discuss the Shoah and other genocides with a view to helping develop an "awareness and compassion in humanity" that actually might contribute to the changing of humanity's behaviour "one word at a time."

It would seem that Shireen's teacher, Ben Gross, at Woburn Collegiate Institute, and presumably other teachers in other public schools, are presenting Holocaust education in a format that is working. Kudos to The CJN for sharing Shireen's essay with its readers.

Amortizing school tuition

Jewish day school spans about 14 years and current annual tuition is about $15,000 to $25,000. This means that Jewish education will cost about $300,000, after tax dollars, per child. That's quite a distance from a university tuition loan, where the need is for between one and five years and is most often backed by the government ("Why not amortize day school tuition?" April 16).

It seems unrealistic to believe that banks will make loans without substantial guarantees or that UJA Federation could possibly act as a guarantor to the necessary degree. So my vote is for confronting reality.

There are many good and valid arguments for organizing the community to "fight city hall" and work for a justified provincial contribution toward the secular portion of the education offered by the Jewish day schools. It will not be an easy struggle, as I foresee the most difficult resistance will be from our own community: from those who wish to fit in, from those whose principles dictate that preserving Jewish identity is no longer of consequence; from those who view Jewish education as a privilege without understanding its long-run necessity for Jewish preservation; and from those in our community who have political power, but will not spend it for this enterprise.

It is, however, a worthwhile struggle. The issue now is to find a David to lead us in battle with this Goliath and the Philistines.

Signs of the times

I very distinctly remember seeing "No Jews no dogs" on a hotel in the New Toronto/Long Branch area in the late 1930s ("'No dogs, no Jews': no evidence," April 9). I was about 10 at the time.

CUSTOM MONUMENTS

The time had come for my wife's unveiling. My kids and I wanted a monument that honoured her memory and captured who she was. A stone of lasting beauty, so that when we visited her grave, we felt close to her. The monument counsellor at Benjamin's Landmark designed a custom stone at a price we could afford. RABBI-2-RABBI

Are rabbis spectators or players?

Sports can be a powerful rhetorical tool to illuminate truths about Jewish life and help religious leaders connect with their congregants

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: Last week, my wife and I hosted our pre-marriage group at our home. The couples who took part showed tremendous sacrifice by attending this program, since the event coincided with the first night of the NHL playoffs.

I often wonder about the place of professional sports in religious life. Sometimes we embrace spectator sports as a community-building opportunity, such as the young families Super Bowl party we host every year. At other times, as when a major contest coincides with Shabbat services or a community lecture, we begrudge the hold that sports have on our congregants. Sometimes, we discuss sports in our sermons to illuminate truths about Jewish life.

How does sports fandom factor into the life of your congregation?

Rabbi Cutler: Alas, this year we have not experienced the tension between watching our local NHL franchise in the playoffs and doing something more synagogue-oriented.

The relationship between sports and Judaism is well reflected in a tale, published in Time magazine in 1951, involving the president of the Jewish Theological Seminary, Rabbi Solomon Schechter, and his student Louis Finkelstein, who went on to become a future JTS president.

Rabbi Schechter, walking one day with Finkelstein, stopped at a newsstand to read the latest World Series scores. "Can you play baseball?" he asked his companion. "No," admitted Finkelstein. "Remember this," said the old man. "Unless you can play baseball, you'll never get to be a rabbi in America."

The story is about the subordinate status of sports in relation to Judaism, but also the recognition that religious leaders must engage in worldly interests in order to connect with congregants and non-Jews. Personally, I think it's wise to use whatever means necessary to build relationships and to engage sports metaphors, so long as they elevate the conversation or sermon. And on an institutional level, Beth Tzedec is now in its second year of lectures on the topic of "Jews in Sports."

Rabbi Scheier: I have a vivid recollection from my childhood when my sports hero – a professional baseball player – was arrested for a drug-related offence. I recall my sense of disappointment when I found out. My mistake, I believe, was that I admired him for being something he never aspired or claimed to be – a leader of integrity and morality. I had confused athletic excellence with moral excellence.

Where sports excel are as a lens for expressing our values. Just this past week, I shared a story with my congregation about the Lubavitcher Rebbe, as he encountered a father and a son walking to a Brooklyn Dodgers game at Ebbets Field. He asked the young boy to explain baseball to him, and the boy explained that, if one team has a large lead toward the end of the game, the fans might leave early.

"Do the players leave early?" the rabbi inquired. "Of course not," the boy responded. "They have to finish the game!"

The lesson, of course, is central to religious life: are we spectators or players? When times are difficult, do we leave the game, or play out our destinies? This is but one example of how sports can be a powerful rhetorical tool to teach values.

Rabbi Cutler: When Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the long-serving rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple, passed away, the New York Times ran a lengthy eulogy. It concluded with the following story.

"In 1935, shortly after he came to the United States, the future Rabbi Plaut received an eloquent lesson in textual interpretation and the reader's need for a learned guide. Newly arrived in Cincinnati, he was shown an article in the sports section of a local newspaper by his fellow seminarians. Glancing at the headline, he recalled years later, he thought the article was about a revolution in Italy. The headline said, 'Reds murder Cardinals.'"

I have long suspected that rabbis have turned to sports as an entry point into "normal" life. In a field that generally focuses on a small segment on the population and limits most meaningful interactions to one's co-religionists, a turn to fandom enables a rabbi to share something with his non-Jewish neighbours and be part of something greater than himself that is completely apart from any official duties. ■

The choir of the Leo Baeck Day School's south campus performed O Canada and Hatikvah as the Israeli flag was raised at Queen's Park April 23 to mark Yom Ha'atzmaut. The students sang the anthems in the presence of Israeli Consul General DJ Schneeweiss, dignitaries from the provincial legislature, and the leadership of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Does Oskar Groening deserve leniency?

Oskar Groening, currently standing trial in Lunenburg, Germany, may not be the last Nazi prosecuted for war crimes committed during the Holocaust. In fact, if lawyers are able to argue convincingly that the "Bookkeeper of Auschwitz" was an accessory to 300,000 murders at Auschwitz, they will endorse a template by which dozens more could be tried for their roles in the Nazi death machine.

Whatever the decision, one thing is certain: we are nearing the end of the era of Nazi hunting. At 93, Groening is healthy and aware. By all appearances, he is fit to be tried, even at this later stage in life.

But he is the exception. As the Simon Wiesenthal's chief Nazi hunter, Efraim Zuroff, put it last week, "It would very much surprise me if Oskar Groening... is not cursing his good health and bad luck. For if he had lived to a slightly younger age, or had been in bad health, it is almost certain that he never would have been prosecuted in a German court for his complicity in the crimes committed at the most notorious of the Nazi death camps."

For every elderly Nazi who may yet be brought before the courts, many more will die without being held to account. Soon, there won't be anyone left to prosecute. That's reason enough to pay close attention to the Groening trial, but even if there were hundreds more cases like it on the slate, this particular one would stand out. Groening has proven himself an unusual defendant right from the start.

Unlike many Nazi war criminals prosecuted before him, he has not tried to deny his role at Auschwitz. Quite the opposite – he has affirmed that he played a part in the Nazi extermination effort, and that he is morally complicit in the diabolical operation at Auschwitz. "This moral guilt," Groening told the courtroom during testimony, "I acknowledge here, before the victims, with regret and humility."

That apology hardly suffices as penance, especially since Groening maintains he is not legally guilty. But it is nonetheless distinct in the history of Nazi trials, and Groening appears to be sincere. On the fifth day of the trial, Groening even embraced one of the survivors who testified against him, and kissed her on the cheek. He has also spoken out against Holocaust deniers for years, issuing a powerful message to those who shamelessly claim the Nazi genocide is a myth: "I want to tell those deniers that I have seen the crematoria," he has said. "I have seen the burning pits, and I want to assure you that these atrocities happened. I was there."

It's tempting to think maybe we should make an exception in the case of Oskar Groening, just this one time, and allow a man who obviously regrets his past to live out his remaining years in peace. But that misses the point. Oskar Groening's job was to sort through the confiscated property of prisoners brought in cattle cars to Auschwitz. He witnessed Jews and others being gassed to death. In his own way, he helped make that happen.

He was there, and nothing can change that. ■ — YONI

RETROSPECTIVE

Al Waxman will forever be the King of Kensington

Jordan Adler

One day, Sara Waxman was driving around Montreal with a French-Canadian guide. Waxman told the woman that she was a widow but that her husband had visited Montreal quite often. When the guide asked for her late husband's name, she replied, "Al Waxman."

"The King of Kensington?" the Québécois guide asked, stunned.

Waxman says the guide instantly pulled over and explained that her father watched King of Kensington — the CBC series that made Al Waxman a household name across the country – religiously. Her father couldn't speak English, the guide said, but he made sure to watch the show every time it was on television.

"He had an impact in many, many small ways," Waxman says of her husband, who would have turned 80 this year. "After he died, I got over 1,000 letters – and I still have them – from strangers all over the country."

Even 14 years after his death, Sara and son, Adam Waxman, often hear about the impact King of Kensington had on the lives of Canadians. Some tell them the show helped to teach their parents English. Sara says a young boy ran away from home and travelled to Kensington Market to meet Al Waxman, who played convenience store owner Larry King on the popular CBC series.

"He was so tender," Adam told The CJN. "I think a lot of people felt they knew him because he put so much of himself into his characters."

Audiences hoping to spend some time in the company of the late acting great should line up early for the Canadian Archival series at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

The TJFF will play an afternoon of King of Kensington episodes May 2 at the ROM Theatre. A Q&A with Sara Waxman, series creator Perry Rosemond, actors Jayne Eastwood and Rosemary Radcliffe and producer Joe Partington will follow the episodes. Adam will lead the Q&A.

The archival series will also highlight some of Waxman's screen work. On May 9, the festival will screen Sun in My Eyes, Waxman's film debut, where he plays a Jewish man confronting the darkness of Nazi-occupied Poland. The same day, audiences can check out The Winnings of Frankie Walls, for which Waxman won an Earle Grey Award, the Gemini Award for lifetime achievement.

When she first saw The Winnings of Frankie Walls, Sara was astonished to discover that the character in the opening scene was her husband. She didn't even recognize him until a few minutes into the film.

"All his performances amazed me because I know the man," she says. "I know every movement, I know every expression. [On-screen], his whole body, his whole demeanour… he became a stranger."

The son of Jewish immigrants from Poland, Waxman was on his way to becoming a lawyer when the flu made him miss several months of classes. He abandoned law school to pursue acting, initially much to his parents' chagrin.

Waxman was working as a director at the CBC and doing occasional acting gigs when he was offered King of Kensington. Although he was first asked to direct, Waxman campaigned for the part of the lead character. The producers approved.

The part of King came to him naturally. As a boy, Waxman grew up near the corner of Spadina Avenue and Nassau Street in Kensington Market in Toronto, living in a small apartment above a poultry shop.

The show was an instant hit, pulling in nearly two million Canadian viewers a week. Canadians responded to King's working-class sensibility, as well as the show's humour, social commentary and ethnic diversity.

"He was so unabashedly proud to be Canadian and to be Jewish," Adam says. "He wasn't one of those actors who would change his name so it sounded less ethnic. He was a really strong proponent of promoting Canada."

He also began Al's Gym, where he mentored professional actors rehearsing a role or preparing an audition. Waxman gave advice and his time, and didn't ask for any money in return.

Adam says that despite his father's busy schedule, he was constantly available for him.

"He would fly home from Los Angeles to help me with my math homework or to watch my judo tournaments or my track meets," he says. "I'd hear him shouting my name, and it would just ignite my spirit because he was there."

After finding fame on Canadian and American TV with Kensington and Cagney and Lacey, Waxman continued to be a mensch in his community. He was the national campaign chairman for the Canadian Cancer Society, as well as a spokesman for Israel Bonds and UJA.

Waxman was named to the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario. There is also a statue of him, appropriately, in Kensington Market. However, he is not on the Canadian Walk of Fame, a point of some controversy.

Late in his career, he put a lot of focus on stage performances. His performance as Willy Loman in a Stratford Festival production of Death of a Salesman in 1997 earned him rave reviews. He lost close to 80 pounds for the play.

Waxman also directed for the stage (Lost in Yonkers in Toronto, The Diary of Anne Frank in Stratford) and television, earning an Emmy nomination for the TV movie Maggie's Secret.

Waxman was slated to play Shylock in a Stratford production of The Merchant of Venice in 2001. However, he died during a bypass operation in January of that year.

"He said, 'I'm going to make everybody love Shylock,'" Sara told The CJN. "And he would have, if he had the chance."

After his father's death, Adam decided to move into acting. He went to the same theatre school his father attended in New York – a symbolic way to walk alongside his father's path, Adam says.

"Under the stage lights, he was a star. But in my eyes, he was so much bigger than that," he says. "He was the greatest man I'll ever know. He gave me enough love to fuel me for a lifetime."■

The Canadian Holocaust film that almost didn't get made

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Having survived the war disguised as a Christian child in Nazi-occupied Poland, Jack Kuper arrived in Canada in 1947 and soon began writing the story of his dramatic wartime ordeal in Yiddish. But the woman in the Jewish family that was taking care of him seemed disinterested in hearing it, so he stopped writing it.

Eventually Kuper mastered English, worked as a graphic designer at the CBC, made many TV commercials, formed the film company Kuper Productions, and wrote a bestselling biography, Child of the Holocaust (1967).

Remarkable for appearing at a time when commercial publishing houses were taking on relatively few Holocaust-themed manuscripts and the subject was widely regarded as taboo, Child of the Holocaust received wide distribution across the English-speaking world and was translated into eight languages. A postwar sequel, After the Smoke Cleared, came out in 1994.

Turns out that Kuper had told much the same story in an earlier, all-but-forgotten teleplay, Sun In My Eyes, which the CBC produced in 1959 and aired – twice, in response to popular demand – in early 1960. Directed by Harvey Hart and featuring a young Al Waxman in one of his earliest starring roles, Sun In My Eyes is being given a free public screening at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival. (Innis Town Hall, May 9, 1:30 p.m.)

During a recent interview in his Forest Hill home, Kuper explained that he wrote Sun In My Eyes after he had commented at a CBC meeting that so many productions were "just frivolous plays about nothing," and someone dared him to write a better play. "I said, 'I will,' and I went home and began writing," he recalled.

The initial response to his script was anything but warm. The first CBC producer he told about it dismissed him and the script without even looking at it. He had a breakfast meeting with CBC drama critic Nathan Cohen, who was equally dismissive. Others were more sympathetic, "but nobody wanted to do it," Kuper said. "This would have been about 1955. Everywhere I went, people said, 'We've already done The Diary of Anne Frank and the war is over, so get on with it."

Sun In My Eyes*, featuring a young Al Waxman, aired on CBC in 1960.

Kuper had no trouble getting other teleplays produced at the CBC. For his play Lost in the Crowd, he changed the Jewish characters to non-Jewish characters – Polish Christians living on Toronto's Queen Street – and it sold without a problem and was well received. "Paddy Chayefsky was doing exactly the same thing at the time. You simply changed the Jews to non-Jews, because you could sell only so many Jewish stories."

But another script that featured Jewish characters, It Happened in Kensington Market, was also summarily rejected. "They got back to me, and they said, 'We already have a play for Passover,'" Kuper said. As for Sun In My Eyes, one producer seriously urged him to change the locale so that it takes place among the Eskimos in the Arctic, thereby making it a Canadian subject. Kuper even adapted the script for radio, only to be told, "The war is over, it's time to forget and move on.

"People didn't want to talk about the Holocaust – it was like talking about cancer. It made people very uncomfortable, and all I wanted to do was talk about it."

Fortunately, a producer who was impressed with Kuper's other works asked to see a copy of the script, loved it, and bought it the next day. Production ensued within a few months. Because of restrictions in videotape editing capabilities, the play was shot in a studio with several cameras, interiors as well as exteriors, one scene after another as though it was a live production.

"You couldn't go on location somewhere. Everything was done in the studio," Kuper said. "You'd have to write it like that, too, so it would work. You couldn't have a character dressed in a certain way, and in the next shot, he's dressed differently. There wasn't enough time. You'd have to write another scene in between to give him time to change costumes."

Kuper admits he altered the story to suit the medium.

"Although it says at the beginning that the story you are about to see is true, I took liberties," he said.

"The true story is in my book; that's how it happened and I didn't have to play with it. But in a play, you need the dramatic curve, the dramatic angle to it."

How does he feel now that TJFF is presenting a public screening? "It feels wonderful, especially when I think back on the struggle that I had producing this," said the veteran producer-director, who has agreed to provide an introduction to the screening.

Presented as part of a series of Waxman films, Sun In My Eyes also ties into the TJFF's "archival film" track. Other titles include director David Troster's 1984 documentary Spadina, about Toronto's famous downtown Jewish district in its last throes; the Rod Serling series, which features The Twilight Zone's creator's rarely screened works, including In the Presence of my Enemies and Requiem for a Heavyweight; Laura Adler's Last Love Affair, which is being screened in memory of the late Israeli director Avraham Heffner, and several others.

When 'Zionism' becomes a dirty word

Gil Troy

To Israel activists, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's cancellation of Valentina Lisitsa's piano solo earlier this month is worrisome.

Lisitsa, a Ukrainian, attacked Ukrainian nationalism so passionately and crassly that the organizers deemed her intolerant. A Ukrainian nationalist online newspaper, Euromaidan Press, focused on her posting "photos of spear-carrying, half-naked African villagers juxtaposed with Ukrainians," with the caption "New school year begins in Odessa with teachers forced to wear Ukrainian tribal dress, a truly European custom." Beyond this, the article accused her of being snide, mean-spirited and a propagandist for Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Mea culpa, I'm out of my depth. I have a rough sense of what's going on in Ukraine, and sympathize with Lisitsa's critics rather than with Putin's totalitarian bullying. So, first valuable lesson for Israel activists: we assume most non-combatants understand the subtleties of the Israeli-Arab conflict as we do. Next time you start talking to someone about Israel, think how little you know about Ukraine, and proceed accordingly, hopefully becoming more humble, clearer, and making fewer assumptions about what people know and how they should feel.

Meanwhile, I am outraged that Lisitsa's words outraged people when more outrageous attacks on Israel have become acceptable. Making the ugly apartheid accusation against Israel, charging Israel with genocide, segregation and oppression, are all as untrue and offensive as Lisitsa's tweets.

I don't believe a far left or Palestinian concert pianist would lose a gig over similar anti-Israel tweets. This summer, Steven Salaita did lose a tenured position in Illinois over tweets but they were much harsher. He condoned murder by tweeting: "I wish all the f…ing West Bank settlers would go missing. He justified Jew hatred by tweeting: "Zionists: transforming 'anti-Semitism' from something horrible into something honourable since 1948."

This outrage gap is a serious problem. On campus, super-sensitive, politically correct students complain about "micro-aggressions" they perceive in body language or nuanced words, yet many of these same students commit macro-aggressions against Israel and the Jewish People. They worry about scholarly books, articles and lectures analyzing racism, sexism, homophobia, sexual assault, being "triggering," while often being the most likely to launch offensive salvoes against Israel and Zionism.

These double standards lead to a most un-Canadian conclusion. Precisely because of the power of political passions and the relativism of political judgments, I condemn the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for cancelling the performance. Given my disappointment in so many establishment judges, especially on campus, I would rather trust free speech and the free marketplace of ideas. Better to trust most people to ignore Lisitsa's ugliness than empower modern elites to determine whether her politics make her suitable for performing Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto.

This analysis particularly applies regarding a concert pianist or mathematician whose political words are irrelevant to their performing or problem-solving. It is trickier with humanists or social scientists. If a colleague showed such poor judgment as to tweet offensive and intolerant words, I would fear a similar inability to be suitably restrained when teaching controversial subjects or properly tolerant when facilitating student discussions. Still, the repressive alternative is worse.

I write as a proud liberal democrat championing free speech – as well as an embattled Zionist. I know – and regret admitting this – that in too many elite circles today, especially in academia, Zionism is so despised that simply calling yourself a Zionist can be seen as offensive and "racist," let alone micro-aggressive and triggering.

Zionism is already politically incorrect on too many campuses, among too many Middle East scholars. What happens if Zionism goes from being not PC to "verboten"? If we have tolerated all kinds of other assaults on free speech, we will have few allies left and no foundation left on which to stand. And so, with full contempt for Ms. Lisitsa's tweets, tone and tolerance for totalitarianism and terrorism, I say, nevertheless, let her play Rachmaninoff, so those of us with politically incorrect opinions can still express ourselves. ■

Sara Horowitz

There's something about the experience of going to the movies that makes magic. The darkened room, the fellowship of audience, the larger-than-life screen all combine to transport us to a different time or place, and to make us believe, at least for the time we sit in the theatre, in the world the director, actors and cinematographer have conspired to create for us.

Today, of course, we see movies not only in grand movie palaces, but in multiplex venues with tiny screening rooms, at home on TV screens, computers and tablets, and even on our phones at the beach. The easy access to movies anywhere and the smallness of many screens has made viewing films less of an occasion than it was decades ago and perhaps also diminished that sense of magic that struck early moviegoers. But the ability to watch films over and over, to replay certain scenes and to zoom in on details can also give us a stronger sense of how movies are put together, what makes them work and how they can be in conversation with one another.

But the ability of a well-made film to make us think and feel in unanticipated ways remains. At the same time that movies bring us out of ourselves and our ordinary lives, they also press us to think about our inner lives, our society, our politics, and to imagine our way into other people's lives. If this is true of movies generally, it is stunningly true of Israeli movies, a longtime fascination of mine.

For many years, I made it a priority to frequent the wonderful Jerusalem International Film Festival, the special project of the late Lia van Leer, held annually at the Jerusalem Cinematheque with the support of the Jerusalem Foundation. The festival features a dizzying array of films from all over the world, responding to the Israeli thirst for virtual travel and cultural diversity. But for me, the appeal was always the ability to see new Israeli films, many of which would have their world premiere there.

In addition, whenever I am in Israel, I make it a practice to stop at a favourite Jerusalem DVD store whose amazing staff know their stuff. They have pointed me to sleepers that deserve a wider audience, as well as promising new directors and remastered early gems. Back in Toronto, the movies are a way to stay connected to contemporary Israeli culture, up to date on slang and connected to the pulse of the country. And, of course, Jewish film festivals across Canada bring fine Israeli (and other) films to us.

This fascination impelled me to offer a new two-semester course at York University that focuses on the vibrant Israeli film industry. We looked primarily at feature films produced since Israel attained sovereign statehood. All in all, my students and I viewed, discussed and analyzed more than 40 movies.

Putting the course together provided me the impetus to look back on almost seven decades of movies. And listening to my students talk about the films often made me see them new ways. It was interesting to think about which age well and which don't, in view of the changes in cinematic styles, esthetic sensibilities and social norms. What impresses me most is the sheer talent and daring of the Israeli film industry, from its early years until today. Israeli cinema has functioned as an important vehicle through which to explore questions of identity, immigration, conflict, war and peace, gender, ethnicity, the Holocaust, and the tensions between individual and collective values, offering a valuable – and often critical – window on Israeli society. Israeli directors have been willing to tackle difficult, controversial and complex issues, and Israeli audiences have been eager to see themselves in these challenging cinematic reflections. Perhaps the most magical aspect of Israeli movies is their place in reflecting and also maintaining a diverse and open society. ■

Why Netanyahu's victory should please Canadian Jews

Michael Taube

Benjamin Netanyahu's stunning re-election victory in last month's Israeli elections was the best result that all western nations, including Canada, could have hoped for.

Sure, there are some obvious reasons why I make this statement.

I'm a small "c" conservative on fiscal and social issues. I share Netanyahu's support for smaller government, lower taxes, the free market and private enterprise, and fighting the war on terror, among other things. I had also predicted a Likud victory in a few places, including this newspaper, so, it's a pleasure to be proven right!

Most importantly, I believe it.

Besides the positive virtues of his right-leaning political and economic views, Israel's prime minister tends to be a straight-shooter. Netanyahu doesn't sugar-coat his language and ideas with meaningless platitudes. He doesn't propose goals that are impossible to achieve. Rather, he takes strong positions and vigorously defends them on a principled basis.

You may not like what he says. You may not like the way he says it. At the same time, he means what he says – and he says what he means.

When Netanyahu spoke to the U.S. House of Representatives on March 3, for example, he noted that Iran, once "one of the world's great civilizations," had been "hijacked by religious zealots" in 1979. He worried that the Iranians "could soon be armed with intercontinental ballistic missiles and nuclear bombs." He opposed President Barack Obama's contrived deal because it "doesn't block Iran's path to the bomb; it paves Iran's path to the bomb."

Moreover, his comparison between Iran and the Islamic State was direct and powerful: "Iran and ISIS are competing for the crown of militant Islam. One calls itself the Islamic Republic. The other calls itself the Islamic State. Both want to impose a militant Islamic empire first on the region and then on the entire world. They just disagree among themselves who will be the ruler of that empire. In this deadly game of thrones, there's no place for America or for Israel, no peace for Christians, Jews or Muslims who don't share the Islamist medieval creed, no rights for women, no freedom for anyone. So when it comes to Iran and ISIS, the enemy of your enemy is your enemy."

In other words, Netanyahu will not accept peace for peace's sake. He wants it to be a lasting peace that is realistic, beneficial for Israel, and without restrictions and conditions.

The same principle applies to peace in the Middle East.

Netanyahu supports the theory of a two-state solution to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Most rational thinking people do.

Yet, the Israeli PM won't cede land, stop the West Bank settlements, divide Jerusalem and deal with the Palestinian right of return while the terrorist group Hamas continues to wield power and influence. Meanwhile, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' repeated calls for the removal of the Israeli military presence would leave the Jewish state incredibly vulnerable. As well, bringing down the security wall between Israel and the Palestinians would be impossible at this stage when the latter continue to engage in suicide bombings and other attacks.

That's why most small "c" conservatives, including U.S. Republicans and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and the Tories, support Netanyahu and Likud. We believe he's looking at these difficult situations (and others) in a realistic manner, and is handling them to the best of his ability.

Some on the political left, including security-conscious Liberals, would surely agree with this position.

As for Canadian Jews, they should be pleased that a strong leader like Netanyahu remains in power. He will always work hard to ensure the safety and security of Israelis, oppose totalitarian nations, rogue states and terrorist groups, and always fight for a Jewish homeland.

That's what Israel needs. That's what western democracies desire. That's what Canada should always support. ■

Michael Taube is a Washington Times contributor, political commentator and former speechwriter for Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Shivah visitation: a modest proposal

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

One area of life that Judaism gets a great deal of admiration for is the way it approaches death and beyond, including the seven-day mourning period usually referred to as shivah. Shivah creates a time and space for mourners to grieve, cry and contemplate, then "get up" and resume life.

Alas, the plan does not always pan out. Having been a rabbi for close to 50 years, I can attest to the slow attrition of the intent behind the shivah. Today, more people tend to look at shivah with dread, as something to endure, an unwelcome imposition. On occasion, mourners decide to skip shivah altogether or shorten it to a day or two. Those who choose to go the full seven days often severely curtail visitation times.

Sometimes, there are health-related factors behind the decision to reduce the shivah sitting time. Those sitting may not be well enough to sit the entire time, if at all. For some, the period leading up to the passing of a family member is emotionally draining, and the surviving family feels wiped out and unable to engage in any conversation. When death is imminent, but the dying person holds on for a few days, with the family literally on a death watch, I often hear family members say, "We have already been sitting shivah for more than seven days."

Much of the shivah problem is related to the changing manner in which people die and the physical, spiritual and emotional impact this has on family caregivers. The net result is that for too many people, shivah is a distortion of what it was intended to be. Visitors to shivahs who experience the noise levels there sometimes make a subconscious decision that if they're ever in such a circumstance, they'll forgo the shivah route.

Recapturing the "magic" of shivah is not easy. It will take the collective community asking itself, "Why exactly am I going to this shivah house? What is my goal? What is my obligation?"

My own answer to this is that the goal should be that as a result of the visit, the mourner or mourners feel a bit better. This can be achieved through conveying, when appropriate, praise for the mourners as caregivers or as loyal family members. Another way is through sharing stories about the deceased with the family. Helping with logistics is also important.

But there's one more shivah-related matter to contemplate, which I call the post-shivah syndrome. This is the empty feeling of the day after, when family returns home and gets back to "normal," and the house where the deceased lived, which had been full to overflowing for seven days, is now empty and eerily quiet, even scary.

This is a vulnerable time when friends are almost desperately needed. Unfortunately, the mindset that has crept into shivah visitation, almost to a fault, is that once it's over, it's over. But it's not. Mourning goes on even when the shivah is done. The pain doesn't disappear with the removal of the chairs.

So my modest proposal, one that's perhaps not very original, is that we introduce, on a more formal basis, the idea of post-shivah visits – one-to-ones, absent the cacophony of sound during shivah and more likely to bring real comfort. It's certainly great for rabbis to do this regularly. It's likewise helpful for close and moderately close friends to do this.

It may sound sacrilegious to say that 15 minutes of meaningful conversation post-shivah is usually more comforting than an hour during shivah spent just contributing to the decibel count. But it's true. ■

Speakers panel praises Israel's dynamism and diversity

jshupac@thecjn.ca

A Yom Ha'atzmaut event featuring an eclectic panel of Israeli speakers drove home the message that Israel is dynamic, unique and successful across a range of fields.

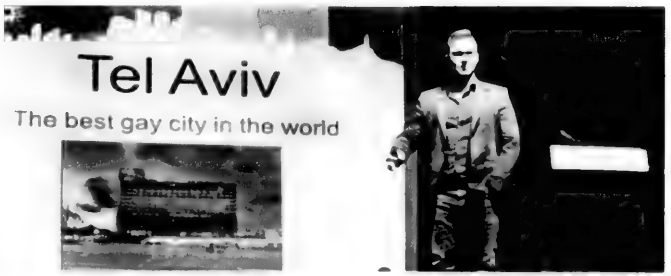
"Talking Tachless: Israeli Speakers Night," held April 22 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's Al Green Theatre, was co-ordinated by Irit Stopper, Israel's deputy consul general in Toronto; Eran Shafir, regional representative of the Jewish Agency for Israel; Lee Mes, director of Israeli-Canadian outreach and engagement at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Dan Horowitz, federation's editorial director and senior writer.

Attended by more than 200 people, the event was part of an initiative led by the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Israeli Consulate to mark Yom Ha'atzmaut in an innovative and comprehensive way across the Toronto Jewish community.

To highlight the unique character of the country, the organizers selected three diverse speakers: IDF Maj.-Gen Orna Barbivai, the highest-ranking female officer in the history of the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF); Raphael Hofstein, the Israeli-born CEO of Toronto's MaRS innovation; and Yaniv Waizman, a Tel Aviv city council member and founder of the organization Israel Gay Youth (IGY).

Barbivai spoke in glowing terms about the IDF, characterizing it as highly progressive and diverse.

Having served in the IDF for 34 years, she described leaving her small hometown in northern Israel for the IDF's human resources corps and working her way up to becoming the army's first female major general.



Yaniv Waizman is the adviser to the mayor of Tel Aviv on LGBTQ issues.

This opened up doors for other women in the country, Barbivai said, and further set the IDF apart from other, less progressive national armies.

"The IDF reflects all the Jewish people – it's a meeting ground for young people all over the country and even the world," she said, adding that it "encourages each individual to find a position that's suitable for them."

The army works to help ultra-Orthodox soldiers, lone soldiers and Ethiopian immigrant soldiers integrate as best they can.

"We pride ourselves on our wonderful military – it's one of the best in the world," Barbivai said.

Hofstein focused on Israel's forward-thinking mentality where technology and innovation are concerned.

He spoke about the country's invaluable investment in incubation programs in the 1980s and '90s and how that has nurtured entrepreneurs and contributed to a highly successful start-up culture.

He described how, for about 20 years after the Yom Kippur War in 1973, the country was suffering "a king of communal post-traumatic stress disorder." This was partly alleviated, he said, by the surge of new life and new ideas that came from the million or so Soviet Jews that Israel let in after the lifting of the Iron Curtain in 1989.

"Between absorbing Russian talent and supporting innovation, this was the shock treatment that we as a country needed [to cure our sense of trauma]," he said.

Waizman, who discovered that he was gay while serving in the army and is now the adviser to the mayor of Tel Aviv on LGBTQ issues, said Tel Aviv has come to be known as "the best gay city in the world," and he outlined his journey to promote it as such internationally.

He talked about the difficulty of being in the closet and feeling he didn't have many LGBTQ role models to look up to.

After leaving the army, he visited San Francisco and came across an LGBTQ youth centre, inspiring him to start something similar in Israel.

He teamed up with a local journalist to build the centre, and the two developed Israel Gay Youth (IGY), a non-profit that promotes tolerance and opposes discrimination against the LGBTQ community, as well as encouraging LGBTQ teenagers and young adults to lead the way in building a more tolerant society.

"People from all over the world should come see how this city treats the gay community," Waizman said, citing as examples the municipality putting up money to build a Gay and Lesbian Association centre and the city's immense Gay Pride Parade.

When he decided to enter city politics and was elected to city council, Waizman asked to oversee "the gay issue and the tourism issue."

He ultimately linked the two, creating successful campaigns to draw tourists to the city in order to experience its rich gay culture.

He invited bloggers and "opinion makers" from all over the world to visit the city, he said.

Waizman's efforts appear to have paid off: while the first Pride Parade in 1997 drew roughly 1,000 tourists, he said, last year brought about 20,000.

"I discovered that when people come to Tel Aviv they fall in love with the city and become ambassadors of it," he said. ■

BRINGING THE LIGHT OF TORAH AND WARMTH OF MITZVOT TO JEWS EVERYWHERE

Petah Tikva, local shuls partner for Yom Ha'atzmaut

Music included for the first time as organizers aim to make annual celebration a community-wide event

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

For Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation, this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration – which was organized in partnership with a number of other North York shuls – was bigger than ever.

Jack Benaim, co-chair of the April 23 event, which included a heated tent with a petting zoo, camels, live entertainment, a barbecue dinner, and more, said one of the main goals was to make the celebration a community-wide event.

Although there have been Yom Ha'atzmaut events organized at Petah Tikva in the past, Benaim guessed that there hasn't been an event to this scale in at least 20 years.

One of the main differences from last year's event is the inclusion of music. Benaim explained that last year, the leadership was concerned about playing music during the Omer (the quasi-mourning period between Pesach and Shavuot), which is forbidden, but this year, they agreed to add Israeli music to the festivities.

Petah Tikva vice-president and event organizer Jacob Benarroch said that in the past, the shul has always held a ceremony to commemorate Yom Ha'atzmaut, but hasn't hosted a party on this scale in recent memory.

"Last year, there was a carnival – there was a barbecue, there was a photo booth and kids activities, but no music and not in partnership with other shuls," Benarroch said.

"This year we wanted to make it a community event, so we reached out to multiple Moroccan shuls in the area and two – Magen David [Sephardic Congregation] and Tiferet [Israel Congregation] – partnered up with us, so that was something new. It doesn't happen often that we have these kinds of events that are run by multiple synagogues."

Benaim added that this event was also the first time that Petah Tikva partnered with Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, a Conservative shul located west of Petah Tikva.

While Beth David had its own event with live music, a DJ and catered food, the two congregations came together at the end of the evening in Beth David's large parking lot for an impressive professional fireworks display.

Cari Kozierok Bahar, Beth David's executive director, said that in the past, many shuls in North York didn't plan huge celebrations for Yom Ha'atzmaut, because there was an event held at the JCC on Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard Avenue.

"For us, it used to be that everyone went to the JCC and participated in the UJA event, but now, they moved it so far north," she said, referring to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Yom Ha'atzmaut event at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

"Having a program like this, we felt was a good way of creating something in our neighbourhood so that we could celebrate in a big way, the way it should be done," she said.

Benarroch said he was committed to organizing an event that would give the kids in the community a way to celebrate the State of Israel.

"While my kids go to [Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School] and will learn about the impact of Yom Ha'atzmaut there, I think it is important that kids realize the miracle that is the State of Israel and what it means for us as Jews and the security we have because of it," he said.

"The same way that we celebrate Purim with a huge carnival and the kids associate Purim with something fun, I want them to have that same association with the creation of the State of Israel and know that it is something important and something they can look forward to every year celebrating it. For the kids, we want to ingrain it in them that the State of Israel is something to be proud of and it is a great occasion." ■

Ottawa, province fund Baycrest brain health initiative

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Baycrest is spearheading a new national network that will develop innovative products and services focused on brain health and seniors care, thanks to funding announced in last week's federal and provincial budgets.

The Conservative government in Ottawa said April 21 it will be investing $42 million over five years to help establish the Canadian Centre for Aging and Brain Health Innovation. Two days later, the Liberal government at Queen's Park announced a grant of $23.5 million.

The idea for the centre, developed by Baycrest in consultation with 40 industry, academic, public and not-for-profit sector partners, was proposed by Baycrest to the federal government several months ago, said spokesperson Kelly Connelly.

Partners include the Ontario Brain Institute, the Alzheimer Society of Canada, MaRS Innovation, IBM, Johnson & Johnson Inc. and Facebook.

In addition to the government investments, a further $25 million is coming from Baycrest Foundation and another $33 million from partner organizations, bringing the total investment in the centre to $123.5 million.

William Reichman

The initiative, set to launch in the fall, will focus on what Baycrest described in a statement as "optimizing the cognitive, emotional and physical well-being of older adults" by developing products that meet an aging population's increasing demand for aging and brain health technologies.

Though not a physical entity, the centre will function as a network, led by Baycrest from its Bathurst Street campus. Work on affiliated projects will take place at Baycrest or the sites of partnering organizations.

"This is one of the largest investments in brain health and aging in Canadian history, and likely the largest of its kind involving the long-term care sector anywhere in the world," said William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest.

He noted that the government investment is of particular value, because a rapidly aging population means dementia-related disorders, such as Alzheimer's, are "presenting daunting health and economic challenges across Canada and around the world."

He added: "This investment helps lay the foundation that will enable us to accelerate the innovation cycle of great ideas, from initial concept through testing, evaluation and market penetration."

Connelly said that over time, the centre plans to develop more than a dozen products including a "facial recognition device," a software application to aid people with memory disorders by retrieving names and personal information; and a "mobile medication monitoring" application that, through a partnership with the Rexall pharmacy chain, will help seniors monitor and stick to medication regimens using tablets and smartphones.

> "[redacted]"

Baycrest is a leader, both nationally and globally, in the field of aging and brain health services and technology, particularly as a result of research and academic work being done at its Rotman Research Institute, Reichman said.

Two examples, he noted, are its "Virtual Brain" project, which allows physicians to test rehabilitation strategies on a digitally simulated model of a person's damaged brain, as well as the online memory test Baycrest launched to help people determine if they're experiencing memory problems. ■

CHAT students to hold casino night for Beit Halochem

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Though they're still too young to gamble, Oriel Cohen and his friend Jared Hyde figured a casino night was a good way to raise money for Beit Halochem Canada, a non-profit organization that helps disabled Israeli veterans and victims of terrorism.

Students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Vaughan campus, Cohen, 17, and Hyde, 16, were asked to co-ordinate a fundraiser for a cause of their choice by their mentors at the Jewish Professional Alliance (JPA).

The JPA, a program made available through NCSY Canada, connects high school students to successful business and medical professionals, and this is Cohen's second year participating and being responsible for organizing a charity event.

"Last year, Jared and I organized a scotch-tasting night for Zareinu [an education centre for children with special needs] and we raised around $10,000."

Jared Hyde

Oriel Cohen

Cohen said. "This year, we chose Beit Halochem, because Israeli soldiers give so much to Israel and Jews in our country, and this is a way of us giving back to them." He added that the cause is one he's sure many in the Toronto Jewish community would likely be happy to support.

The casino night, which will take place May 3 at the Lipa Green Building, will involve both a poker tournament and games including roulette, craps and blackjack.

Poker players must pay a buy-in fee of $500 to join the tournament and will compete for a grand prize of 160,000 Aeroplan flier points, which were donated by the company.

For those not playing poker, the general entrance fee is $180 and prizes – all of which were donated by corporate sponsors – include tickets to Toronto Raptors and Toronto Blue Jays games, formal dress shirts and short-term memberships to the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"Our goal for the night is to raise around $20,000," Cohen said, "and we hope to get at least 32 people for the poker tournament and between 20 and 30 for the general casino."

Cohen and Hyde, who both plan to study business at the post-secondary level, have been spreading the word about their event through emails, Facebook and personal calls to potential donors.

Cohen stressed that everyone is welcome, regardless of prior experience. ■

The casino night for Beit Halochem Canada begins at 7 p.m., Sunday, May 3. For tickets and information, contact Oriel Cohen at orielcohen123@hotmail.com

Correction

An item in the April 23 Trending ("Facebook apologizes for removing picture... Photo flagged as insensitive") incorrectly stated that Facebook removed a picture posted by Julian Ciss, Canadian executive director of Jews for Judaism, of his daughter holding an Israeli flag at the entrance to Auschwitz. In fact, while the social media site did ask him to consider removing the picture, he didn't, and neither did Facebook, which only tagged the picture as being "insensitive." Facebook issued an apology to Ciss on Yom Hashoah. ■

Panel ponders whether Israel is fulfilling promise

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Karen Mock

Is the idea of Israel as a Jewish state incompatible with it being a contemporary western democracy, or is it simply a nation state the way many European countries are?

That was one of several tough questions raised at a panel discussion April 20 entitled "My Promised Land – Have We Fulfilled the Promise?" hosted by UIA Federation of Greater Toronto and held at the Prosserman JCC.

The talk, moderated by Michael Dobner, a partner at Pricewaterhouse Coopers and an adjunct law professor at the University of Toronto, featured Karen Mock, human rights consultant and spokesperson for JSpace Canada; Berl Nadler, GTA co-chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA); and Rabbi Michael Stroh, rabbi emeritus at Temple Har Zion, looking critically at Israel's democratic, moral and Jewish character.

Dobner posed four questions to the panel, each of which was briefly opened up to the audience of about 100 people.

The first, whether Israel is "a Jewish state or a state for the Jews," generated a discussion about how Israel compares to other countries, specifically with regard to the treatment of minorities.

Dobner noted that many Israeli intellectuals consider a Jewish state and a western democratic state to be mutually exclusive concepts.

Rabbi Stroh countered that Israel shouldn't be singled out for having a unifying national identity, as there are two kinds of countries: those that, like many European countries, have a national identity and those, like Canada and the United States, that don't.

The question, he said, is, "Should Israel be a western democracy like Canada and the U.S. and not have a national identity or be a western democracy that does have one?"

Nadler said that "all western European democracies are nation states," and all, like Israel, face the challenge of how to deal with minorities.

"I think Israel deals with minorities not perfectly or even optimally, but better than some," he said. "For example, as a Muslim, wouldn't you rather live in Israel right now than in the slums of Paris?"

Mock emphasized that the Zionists who created the Jewish State of Israel wanted to ground the country in the values of freedom, justice and peace, and to ensure equality for all inhabitants, regardless of race or religion.

Still, she said that Israel, like other democracies – including Canada – grapples with "the question of insiders and outsiders – those with power and those without" – and those who feel their land was taken.

The second question was what, if anything, are unique Jewish values, given that many that were once seen as Jewish values such as social justice – are now considered mainstream.

Rabbi Stroh argued that Judaism has a rich tradition and contemporary Jews must decide which values to highlight.

Mock returned to the issue of minority groups, noting, "[On this issue], we Jews might want to hold ourselves to a higher standard – this isn't the same as the world holding us to a different standard in an anti-Semitic way – just as [consul general of Israel to Toronto] DJ Schneeweiss [has] said, 'Israel is a work in progress,'" and should continuously strive for better.

An audience member asked how Israel can balance equal rights for minorities with security.

Mock said this is extremely difficult, and Israel must implement systemic changes, through education and policy, to promote understanding and compassion between Israel's different groups.

The third question was whether Israel still serves as a cultural and spiritual centre for Jews and whether Diaspora Jews are entitled to try to influence Israeli policy.

Mock said for Diaspora Jews to give advice is one thing, but, "if we as Jews really want to influence Israel, we've got to vote with our feet – make aliyah," though she said she doesn't expect all Jews to do so.

The final question was whether Israel serves as a light unto the nations.

Mock said this idea applies not to Israel the "nation state," but to "the people of the covenant," who have made major contributions to the world in terms of civil rights, education, etc.

"Yes, it's tough to be or lagoyim – a light unto the nations – when your security is threatened and you're threatened by anti-Semitism, but we must continue to strive for it, and to find a path that ensures peace for everyone," she said. ■

Winnipeg CJA drive falls short for 2014-15

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Adam Bronstone

For 16 years, Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign has annually reached or exceeded its ever-growing fundraising targets – but all winning streaks must come to an end at some point, and for the Winnipeg CJA, unfortunately, that turned out to be the 2014-2015 campaign.

The 2013-2014 drive raised $5.8 million, an increase of about $150,000 over the previous year. The goal for the 2014-15 drive was $5,950,000. The final tally, however, was $5,647,806 – more than $300,000 short of the goal and almost $150,000 less than last year.

In an update in early February, longtime CJA campaign director Elaine Goldstine conceded that the pace of gifts was slower than in the recent past.

"It has been a tougher year," she said at the time. "But we remain optimistic."

In an email sent out March 18 in an effort to pick up the pace of gifts, Adam Bronstone, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's CEO, issued a challenge to the community on behalf of campaign co-chairs Bob Silver and Daniel Friedman.

Silver and Friedman had pledged to give an additional $28,000 to the CJA campaign if another 150 donors came forward before March 31.

The appeal fell short, however. Goldstine said the campaign did attract 380 new donors overall, including another 136 new pledges in response to the appeal. She also said the campaign did well from the 2,800 pledges received. The major reason for the overall shortfall was that several major donors from previous years had passed away, she said.

"We are already planning the 2015-2016 campaign," she added. "We are hoping to get more new donors."

The new campaign chair is lawyer Bryan Klein, a longtime CJA canvasser.

The new women's philanthropy campaign chair is Elana Schultz, who has been a CJA canvasser since she was a teenager and has been very involved in the women's campaign for the last few years, Goldstine said.

Jared Akman and Baillie Chisick are carrying on as co-chairs for a second year as the young adult division campaign co-chairs. "We are putting more focus on our young adult division campaign," Goldstine said in an interview last year. The young adult division raised $347,866 from 531 younger adult donors during the 2014-15 campaign, a figure that is included in the $5.6 million total.

Goldstine said about 20 per cent of the funds raised are earmarked for overseas initiatives such as the March of the Living, Birthright, Israel advocacy and support for programs in Israel and some of the countries of the former Soviet Union.

The campaign itself and the federation's overhead costs account for nine per cent each of the funds raised, with the remainder being designated for local beneficiary agencies.

While planning has already begun for the 2015-16 campaign, Goldstine said no dollar target figure has been set yet. ■

N.S. immigration program for Russian Israelis on hold

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

A successful immigration program that brought more than 120 Russian Israelis to Nova Scotia since 2008 has been temporarily halted due to federal policy changes that no longer give weight to the Jewish community's support for newcomers when their applications are assessed.

As part of efforts to revitalize a dwindling Jewish community, the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) attracted Israeli Jews, mostly with Russian roots, to Halifax, where they found jobs, bought homes and cars, and placed hundreds of children in schools.

Yet the changes in federal immigration standards, which filtered down to affect the AJC's program, have caused a halt to the migration.

"The province made changes in 2014 and 2015 in consultation with the federal government and has left us little opportunity to continue our program," said a disappointed Edna LeVine, director of community engagement for the AJC. "We were successful, but because of the federal government's revised policies, support from the AJC won't help new immigrants gain entry. It's been more than a year since we've interviewed new candidates."

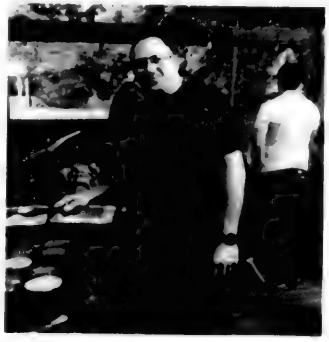
The AJC program in Nova Scotia, which was also running in neighbouring New Brunswick in Saint John, Moncton and Fredericton, has helped a shrinking Jewish population in the region revive itself and create some enthusiasm for the future.

"We've been told by the province's department of immigration that they'll discuss with us the next steps," said LeVine.

That was confirmed last week by Suzanne Ley, executive director of the Nova Scotia Office of Immigration.

"In 2013, the federal government said to close the stream whereby communities could identify and support applications. In Nova Scotia, we started a new program last January, a pilot called Nova Scotia Demand Express Entry, but it does not give any weight to support from community groups such as the AJC. And we can't make any changes to our programs without negotiating with the federal government."

She said "the strength of the new system was purported to be that it would be fast, flexible and responsive to a changing labour market. It also aimed to cut processing times. Under the old system, every application had to be assessed in the order it was received, even as backlogs grew. Under Express Entry, only those with a strong chance of qualifying for permanent residency need further assessment."



Mark Shvartzman handles the barbecuing at a community event in Halifax. The Russian-born Israeli immigrant arrived in Halifax a couple of years ago as part of the Atlantic Jewish Council's newcomer program.

Ley stressed that the AJC "still plays a role" but it's different.

The province will continue to work with the AJC and ensure that it supports and welcomes new immigrants, she said. "The bottom line today is the AJC is still promoting Nova Scotia as an immigrant destination, but it's not part of the application process."

She added: "The federal government has the final say [on who is admitted to Canada], and we have to follow its legislation. They make the final decision on all nominations."

LeVine stressed that the AJC-supported program "was a success because we facilitated settlement. We welcomed these families and provided a community connection. We had a very high retention rate, with most of the candidates we identified remaining here in Halifax, settling into homes and jobs, which is exactly what the provincial government is looking for."

Ley added, "We're hoping the Express Entry program works. We're continually assessing our streams and will make adjustments if necessary."

LeVine concluded, "The big question is how can [the province] find a way to create criteria so we can continue our program." ■

Canadian Embassy to move to new location in Tel Aviv

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

From the outside, the Canadian Embassy in Israel looks like a typical commercial building on a narrow street in a section of east Tel Aviv.

At 3 Nirim St., an address the embassy shares, you can also find a Georgian restaurant as well as several other small eateries. Across the street is a shop called Banana, which appears to sell swimwear and footwear, and one of the embassy's neighbours just down the street is a car repair shop.

It's not particularly glamorous, but that's about to change.

The Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development (DFATD) confirmed last week that it "is looking to replace [the current embassy] with a more suitable, modern building consistent with our current standards."

The embassy in Tel Aviv's Yad Eliyahu district has been located in a leased space in a multi-tenant office building since 1996. Before that, it was located in a residential neighbourhood, at Havarkon and Jabotinsky streets, only minutes from the beach.

The building that houses the current embassy at 3 Nirim St. GOOGLE STREET VIEW PHOTO

The ambassador's official residence is in Herzliya Pituach, an upscale community north of Tel Aviv.

The federal government is looking to acquire a 26,000-square foot facility that will double as an embassy and the ambassador's residence.

"No decisions have yet been taken with respect to site selection, design, scope or cost," DFATD stated in response to CJN queries.

DFATD officials did not respond to a CJN question about whether the government considered moving the new embassy to Jerusalem, which Israel designates as its capital but whose status isn't recognized as such by most countries, including Canada.

"Canada values its strong relationship with Israel and will ensure its diplomatic presence is reflective of this relationship," said DFATD spokesperson Bianca Healy.

"[The 2012 federal budget] committed the government to replace certain diplomatic properties with more appropriately located properties," she added.

The embassy currently employs 62 staff in all, 47 locals and 15 who it describes as "Canada-based."

"The new embassy will provide better access to services for Canadians in the country, as well as Israeli visitors, and will support Canada's trade agenda in this dynamic country," DFATD stated.

Canada and Israel entered a free trade agreement in January 1997 and since then, merchandise trade has more than doubled. According to DFATD data, it exceeded $1.4 billion in 2013.

In January 2014, Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met in Israel and announced the two countries would take steps to modernize and expand the Canada Israel Free Trade Agreement.

Vivian Bercovici currently serves as Canadian ambassador to Israel. A Toronto lawyer, she was appointed to the position by then-foreign affairs minister John Baird in January 2014. ■

Tories choose Libman as candidate in Mount Royal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The party's evident support for Pascale Déry was not enough for her to win the Conservative nomination in Mount Royal.

Robert Libman will be the Conservative candidate in the Montreal riding in the federal election scheduled for Oct. 19.

At the April 26 nomination meeting held at the YM-YWHA, party officials announced that 1,668 ballots were cast. The breakdown was not disclosed, but Déry later told the media that it was "tight."

The party said it now has 3,000 members in Mount Royal, an all-time high in this riding that has been Liberal for 75 years.

That record is thanks to the vigorous campaigns conducted by both Libman and Déry.

The result means Libman, 54, the former mayor of Côte St. Luc, will face off against the current mayor, Liberal candidate Anthony Housefather, 44.

Mount Royal, whose population is about 35 per cent Jewish, has been represented by Irwin Cotler since 1999.

This was the first contested nomination by either major party since a Liberal one in 1984.

Lawyer Neil Drabkin suddenly withdrew his nomination on April 22 at a closed-door meet-the-candidates meeting and threw his support behind Déry.

Drabkin, who served as chief of staff to two Harper cabinet ministers, entered the race just before the March 26 deadline. He said he had been asked to run by longtime riding members because they were concerned by what they saw as an unhealthy Ashkenazi-Sephardi split between Libman and Déry's supporters.

He said his decision to support Déry was "a gesture I believed to be in the best interests of the party."

A fourth would-be candidate, Suburban editor Beryl Wajsman, bowed out just before the deadline. He did not endorse anyone.

Libman, an architect, launched his campaign back in the summer. Déry, 38, a political newcomer with a 15-year career in television journalism, entered in January.

It was clear the Conservatives' Quebec wing favoured Déry. Cabinet ministers Steven Blaney and Maxime Bernier and Senator Jacques Demers campaigned for her.

Young, attractive and francophone, she was a media personality they thought could change the Conservatives' image in Quebec.

She clearly also enjoyed strong support from her Sephardi community, and momentum appeared to be on her side.

Libman was still perceived by some as an English-rights militant because of his leadership of the Equality Party in the late 1980s and early '90s.

Robert Libman, left, and Denis Lebel speak to the media after Libman was chosen as the Conservative candidate for Mount Royal.

Federal Infrastructure Minister Denis Lebel, the Conservatives' Quebec lieutenant, after Libman's victory, quickly tried to dispel that, saying his experience and wide recognition are assets.

The riding association's nomination chair Gary Shapiro told The CJN that the drama surrounding this nomination speaks well for the Conservatives' fortunes. That four people at some point sought to carry the party banner is a watershed in a riding where in the past "we had to twist somebody's arm."

The campaign unofficially began with Lebel disparaging Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau as "not having the judgment to be prime minister."

Libman said Housefather lacks his experience as a member of the National Assembly and of the Montreal executive committee. He is confident he has support "in all corners and layers of the riding," not just Côte St. Luc.

Asked about any party bias, he said, "The party did not interfere or take sides, from my perspective."

Libman stressed the need for unity and said "there is an important place for Pascale in the centre of the party."

Déry, who made no concession remarks, told the media she thinks the assumption she was the party's official pick can now be put to rest after the result.

She was indefinite about a future role in the party or election. "I just want to take some time off. It's too soon to say what role I might have."

Libman sounded confident. "In 1989, I won in the safest Liberal seat in the province [D'Arcy McGee]. This time I will win in what has been called the safest Liberal riding in Canada."

While the Liberals' popularity in Mount Royal has been dropping, especially in the last two elections, that trend may be reversing. The website threehundredeight.com, which tracks polling, estimated on April 24 that the Liberals will get 67 per cent of the vote and the Tories just 20 per cent in the election. ■

Garin Tzabar helps lone soldiers in Israel

plungen@thecjn.ca

Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbivai

When you're a parent and your child decides to move away from home to live in another city, it can make for a stressful time. But when they decide to move to a different continent, join the army and put themselves in harm's way, it makes for an especially trying time.

It was with a measure of relief that a handful of parents of children serving or about to serve in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) were able to meet the highest ranking female general in IDF history, voice their concerns and get her feedback.

In the back seating area at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant April 23, Maj.-Gen. Orna Barbivai (Ret.), answered questions, dispensed advice and offered to help parents navigate the often inscrutable pathways of the military chain of command, to provide some assistance when their cases warranted.

As a mother of three herself, Barbivai said she understood parents' concerns. But she advised them to remember that their children made a choice to serve in the IDF, and that they shouldn't be surprised that the groundwork they laid, through their children's education and the values they imparted to them, led them to join.

Speaking through an interpreter, Barbivai said in reference to her own daughter, "Her decisions are the reflections of our education."

"Trust their decisions," she advised.

She said their children had taken on responsibilities, they chose to join a cause bigger than themselves, and they will come out of the experience more mature, responsible, self-confident and with friends for life.

Israel benefits from the choices made by Diaspora Jews. By accepting recruits from abroad, "It makes the army stronger… It is not just the army of Israel. It is the army of the Jewish People," she said.

Barbivai's presentation was arranged by Gonen Hollander, director of the Canada region of Tzofim Garin Tzabar. Garin Tzabar is a program for lone soldiers operated by Friends of Israel Scouts, Inc. – Tzofim. It arranges the military service of Diaspora Jews and prepares them for the experience by placing them with other recruits in groups of 20 to 30 young soldiers.

Barbivai said Garin Tzabar provides "a strong support system" for Diaspora volunteers.

Jacob Ladovsky is a Canadian lone soldier who was aided by Garin Tzabar to join the IDF and whose family runs United Bakers.

His father, Philip, said Jacob, 24, came back from a year studying in Israel eager to enlist in a particular IDF unit.

After researching what it would take, Jacob sought out Garin Tzabar to facilitate his enlistment. With a group of other recruits, he travelled to Israel in August 2011 and was placed in Moshav Regba, in the north of the country.

Jacob eventually joined "an elite naval unit."

"It's a worrisome situation," Philip acknowledged, "but no different than any Israeli family."

But, "the self-fulfilment is obvious" along with the maturation.

"He's in the right place," Philip said.

Anat Zilberman, 23, served in the IDF and is now back in Toronto. A native of Israel, she moved to Canada with her family when she was 14, but always expected to serve in the army.

Garin Tzabar smoothed the way for her induction, she said. It arranged five seminars in New York City in the year before her service. There she met other (mostly American) recruits.

In August 2010, she and 300 young people flew to Israel. Her particular unit of 30 was sent to Kibbutz Yiftach, in the north, where they became acclimatized to Israeli life. They worked in the kibbutz factory and toured the country. "We did everything together," she said.

A few of the 30 withdrew from the program before they were inducted into military service. Zilberman served as an infantry instructor for her two years.

As a lone soldier, she'd return from the military base to the kibbutz each weekend and hang out with the other recruits.

Though now back in Canada, she still keeps in touch with the friends she made. Twenty-six of the 30 young people in her group remained in Israel. Eight of them live together and attend Ben-Gurion University in Be'er Sheva.

"We're all friends and we will be forever," she said.

Hollander said there are about 10 Canadian kids in the Garin Tzabar program this year, part of a larger group of 300 worldwide. Given the limited size of the Canadian recruits, they have been paired with a U.S. midwest group and attend meetings in Chicago. They fly to Israel in August.

That's when their parents can begin worrying in earnest. ■

Panellists disagree over the future of European Jewry

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Charlie Hebdo, Hyper Cacher, Toulouse, Copenhagen, Belgium – all scenes of recent terrorist attacks in which many of the victims were targeted as Jews.

For many, those and other incidents raise the question, are Jews safe in Europe or is it about time for them to pack their bags and leave?

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has made his views known: he thinks French Jews should move to Israel. He said so in the immediate aftermath of the Charlie Hebdo and kosher grocery killings.

Several speakers at a panel discussion on the future of European Jewry took Netanyahu to task for raising the provocative suggestion at a moment when French society was rallying behind the slain shoppers and murdered journalists who had been killed by Islamic radicals.

About 150 to 200 people gathered at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on April 26 to hear the views of a panel discussing the future of European Jews. Speaking from Europe via Skype were Rabbi Jair Melchior, chief rabbi of Denmark, and Jonathan Arfi, vice-president of the Council of French Jewish Institutions (CRIF). On hand at the synagogue were TV personality and commentator Michael Coren, Consul General of France in Toronto Jean-Francois Casabonne Masonnave, Avi Mayer, a spokesman for Natan Sharansky of the Jewish Agency for Israel, and Robert Kenedy, a professor of sociology at York University who has done research into French Jews living in Quebec.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover moderated the afternoon event.

Concern over the fate of French Jews is being overdone, Arfi said. In fact, he said, Jewish life "is flourishing," and Jews, who have lived in France for more than 1,000 years, are involved in all aspects of public life.

Anti-Semitism, he acknowledged, is increasing. There were 852 "actions" recorded last year, and France's 600,000 Jews, who make up only 1 per cent of the population, suffered 51 per cent of all racist attacks.

But "we do not live in a period that can be compared to the prewar period," he continued. There is no state-sponsored anti-Semitism, and in fact, "we have strong support from public authorities."

He pointed to the support by government officials following the March 2012 attacks in Toulouse in which a rabbi and three schoolchildren were killed. Following the more recent incidents, there is broader support from across French society, he said.

French Jews will remain in France, he predicted. "We really feel part of French society."

Rabbi Melchior said North Americans have a misguided view that Danish Jews are living in a place like Kosovo or Hebron. Copenhagen, he said, is a wonderful city. People are free to wear a kippah and go about their business without fear.

Danish society is accepting of Jews, and the biggest problem Jews face is retaining their Jewish identity.

Coren said North American Jews look at events in Europe and "panic." They see Europe as a terrifying place for Jews, and it's not, he said.

European anti-Semitism has never been lower, with the exception of Spain, he said.

From left, French Consul General Jean-Francois Casabonne Masonnave, Jewish Agency spokesperson Avi Mayer, Michael Coren and Prof. Robert Kenedy

As for European Muslims, Coren said not all Muslims hate Jews, but almost all the attacks on Jews have been by Muslims.

Many in the Muslim community are poor and live in difficult circumstances. In such conditions, the worst comes out of people, and it's expressed as anti-Semitism, he said.

In France, government officials have been vocal in reassuring the Jewish community of their support. Jews have a future in Europe, and Netanyahu "should be ashamed for what he said," Coren stated.

Casabonne Masonnave, the French consul, suggested that when Prime Minister Manuel Valls said Jews play a central role in French society, he was repeating the views held by civil society.

French society showed tremendous solidarity with the country's Jews, he said.

Valls, who is married to a Jewish woman, said, "If 100,000 Jews leave, France will no longer be France. The French Republic will be judged a failure."

Valls is also quoted in the Atlantic magazine as saying, "There is a new anti-Semitism in France. We have the old anti-Semitism, and I'm obviously not downplaying it, that comes from the extreme right, but this new anti-Semitism comes from the difficult neighbourhoods, from immigrants from the Middle East and North Africa, who have turned anger about Gaza into something very dangerous. Israel and Palestine are just a pretext. There is something far more profound taking place now."

Casabonne Masonnave acknowledged that violence in France has escalated by a factor of 10 since 2000. The government responded by adding 10,000 soldiers, enacting laws and measures to discourage terrorist attacks, punishing acts of anti-Semitism and increasing education.

Mayer, a spokesperson for the Jewish Agency, said immigration to Israel from France has jumped from around 2,000 immigrants a year prior to 2013, to 3,800 in 2013 and 7,300 in 2014.

"This is troubling on a number of levels," he said, adding the number of inquiries about aliyah from French Jews has tripled.

He said he has visited France four times in the last year and a half, and "each time I felt less and less comfortable."

He said that while he was riding the Paris Metro, a woman warned him he should remove his kippah, because "it's not safe."

"The voices I'm hearing from young people I'm speaking to are very distressing." They are planning to leave France, and many are planning on moving to Israel.

Mayer said he attributes the rising immigration figures to a "feeling of community insecurity."

Kenedy said that from 2005 to 2009, he interviewed 30 to 40 French Jews who had settled in Montreal.

Most are Jews of North African origin who moved to France as "a safe haven." They love France and would move back if they felt secure. They referred to the 2006 Halimi incident, in which Ilan Halimi was kidnapped and tortured over 24 days before dying from his injuries.

"That had an effect on a lot of them," Kenedy said.

They were also unhappy that Yasser Arafat had been given a state funeral, asking, "What sort of message is that?"

Kenedy said "it's up to governments" to set the tone of public attitudes and to make Jews feel welcome.

In a question and answer period, Rabbi Melchior insisted that it is safe in Denmark to walk the streets wearing a kippah. And he disputed suggestions that Jews are moving out. Two thousand Israelis have moved to Denmark in the last 10 years, and there are 20,000 living in Berlin.

Mayer applauded the public statements by French government officials against anti-Semitism. That's "a tremendous step forward." Nevertheless, he continued, there is "a rising feeling of insecurity." A survey reported that 74 per cent of French Jews said they would at least occasionally not identify openly as Jews.

Coren disputed the suggestion that Jews are insecure in Europe.

"Europe is still a very safe place for everybody… This is not the Armageddon of European society," he said. ■

BlackBerry buys Israeli hub with WatchDox purchase

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Intel does it. Siemens does too. Companies from across the industrialized world have looked to Israel as a source of high-tech research and development.

Now, for the first time, a Canadian company, BlackBerry, will, too.

Last week, BlackBerry announced it had acquired WatchDox, a data security company and a leader in "enterprise file sync and share" (EFSS) software. Although BlackBerry did not disclose terms of the deal, online sources pegged the value at between $100 million and $150 million (US).

WatchDox, founded in 2008, has its formal headquarters in Palo Alto, Calif., but has a 100-person R & D team in Petah Tikvah, Israel. It boasts a client list of more than 150 Fortune 1000 companies, as well as U.S. government agencies, private equity firms and most major Hollywood studios.

News of the acquisition was first broken by the business media in Israel. BlackBerry subsequently issued a news release acknowledging the purchase, saying, "The addition of WatchDox will extend BlackBerry's commitment to help organizations securely connect employees with each other and with corporate information across all mobile and desktop platforms."

> Israel is already home to more than 350 multinationals from all around the globe

Moti Rafalin, WatchDox's CEO and founder, said, "Enterprises require secure mobile solutions that enable users to more easily collaborate and increase their productivity. WatchDox meets this need by uniting data-centric security with a user-friendly experience that is highly valued by our customers."

Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak said he was pleased with the acquisition. Beyond the immediate business implications, Barak said the purchase "marks an important landmark in Canada-Israel bilateral ties."

"Israel is already home to more than 350 multinationals from all around the globe, including Intel, Apple, Facebook, Google, Walmart, Coca-Cola, IBM, Microsoft, Oracle, Philips, Siemens, Samsung, LG and Huawei, who have established R&D centres, many following the acquisition of an Israeli start-up. This week, Israel can proudly add the first Canadian company to this list and we look forward to even more collaboration between Israeli and Canadian firms."

Barak told The CJN that while the embassy did not play a role in the WatchDox deal, it has made it its mission to bring Canadian and Israeli firms together. The WatchDox deal shows that Israeli companies often possess solutions to Canadian business challenges, particularly in cyber-security, life sciences, the environment and satellite technology.

"Israel has the engineering creativity and ingenuity," he added.

The acquisition comes as the use of cloud-based services to store files continues to grow. That has led to concerns that as more mobile devices are used to access sensitive information, data breaches will ensue.

"BlackBerry is constantly expanding the potential of data security so that it enables more collaboration and sharing rather than creating limitations," said BlackBerry CEO John Chen. "This acquisition represents another key step forward as we transition BlackBerry into the premier platform for secure mobile communications software and applications, supporting all devices and operating systems. Together with last year's Secusmart acquisition, Samsung partnership, our own internal development efforts, and now the acquisition of WatchDox, we now have capabilities to secure communications end-to-end from voice, text, messaging, data and now enterprise file-sync-and share."

High-tech entrepreneur Shlomo Kramer provided the seed investment in WatchDox. He currently serves as chair of its board. He is also co-founder of Imperva and Check Point Software, which provide data security products. ■

Eshet Chayil offers a template for modern Jewish women

Ashira Lapin Gobrin

As a modern religious woman, I often find myself reflecting on the wisdom of our sages, especially when I read ancient texts that remain so relevant and meaningful many thousands of years later. Every Friday night, I have one of these moments when my family sings Eshet Chayil, the alphabetical acrostic poem found in the closing chapter of Proverbs and traditionally chanted at the Shabbat table.

Some say King Solomon wrote Eshet Chayil about his mother, or perhaps his wife. The Midrash Tanchumah says it was Abraham's eulogy to his beloved wife, Sarah. Either way, to me Eshet Chayil stands as an ode to Jewish women through the generations.

But not everyone would agree. CJN columnist Lauren Kramer recently argued (April 16) that Eshet Chayil depicts woman as "a selfless slave," that its lyrics are "utterly outdated and hav[e] no meaning in the context of our present-day reality." Kramer says the poem "doesn't describe her or anyone else she knows, nor does it present a realistic set of goals for anyone to aspire to."

I beg to differ. Eshet Chayil contains references that are both allegorical and literal. Many commentaries suggest the female protagonist of the song is a symbol of the Divine Presence, or of Shabbat itself. But the poem also has a practical layer, describing the female head of the household as a role model for her family and for future generations – a universal image of a woman and a mother eloquently reflected in a song. Whenever Eshet Chayil was written, the concept of a working woman was not modern – it was nothing less than revolutionary. But then Judaism has always placed a high value on the female role, both inside and outside the home.

Eshet Chayil speaks in images that are ancient and at the same time very modern. It demonstrates a woman whose husband entrusts everything to her. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks refers to this woman as "active, practical, a businesswoman as well as director of the household." She is an entrepreneur who is industrious, capable, charitable, wise, empathetic and intuitive. She builds an extensive network and "travels far to earn her livelihood" and at the same time nurtures her family, looks after her staff and "reaches her palm to the poor and extends a hand to the needy." She pays attention to detail while "she makes elegant coverings, her clothing is fine linen and purple wool." She gives care to how she looks and dresses – "she is clothed with strength and dignity." She is wise and kind and hard working, and she has a sense of humour – "she can laugh at the days to come."

Smart, sexy and genuine – what a woman! No wonder the first verse of Eshet Chayil asks: "A woman of valour, who can find?"

In fact, Jewish history is full of such women. Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah were eshet chayils. Both my grandmothers and my mother are eshet chayils. All three of my beloved sisters could be perfectly described as eshet chayils. How lucky I am that my husband thinks this of me, too, and that he expresses that sentiment every Friday night so my children can hear and acknowledge it, and hopefully see themselves as part of a long line of strong Jewish role models, leaders and contributors who all upheld the same ideals and values. Eshet Chayil offers my children a template to work from when they start their own families – how to be strong female presences in their homes, their communities and their workplaces. ■

Ashira Lapin Gobrin is a proud wife and mother of three. She sits on the board of Bnei Akiva Schools and is senior executive of a global software company. She would proudly describe herself as a modern, relevant eshet chayil.

Israel deploys rescue and aid workers to Nepal

JTA

An Israeli rescue team saved four Israelis from Mount Everest, where they had been trapped by the earthquake that has devastated Nepal.

A rescue team sent to Nepal by Harel, an Israeli insurance company, brought the Israeli hikers, who are in good health, to safety on Monday, the Times of Israel reported.

Approximately 100 Israelis were still missing Monday in the earthquake zone, a popular travel destination for young Israelis after finishing their military service, down from 150 the day before. More than 4,800 people are believed to have died in the 7.8 magnitude earthquake, Nepal's worst in 80 years, which occurred last Saturday morning.

An Israeli army jet bound for Kathmandu carrying 250 medical and rescue personnel and supplies, including a field hospital, departed from Israel on Monday afternoon. Earlier in the day, an army plane brought 90 rescue workers and supplies. A third plane was scheduled to take off on Monday night, once a safe runway was confirmed at its destination.

Three Israeli families with babies born to Nepalese surrogate mothers returned to Israel late Sunday night. There reportedly are 23 more such babies, several born prematurely, who are expected to arrive in the next few days following the relaxing of bureaucratic procedures in light of the emergency situation. Four Nepalese surrogate mothers pregnant with Israeli families' babies may also come to Israel, the Times of Israel reported.

Meanwhile two Jewish-American men who are longtime friends and were planning to hike part of Mount Everest had not been heard from on Monday.

Danny Cole, 39, a father of four from Crown Heights, N.Y., and Mendy Losh, 38, originally from Crown Heights and now living in Los Angeles, likely were on a trail that leads to the Everest base camp when the earthquake struck, triggering avalanches in the area.

When the first Israeli IDF jet arrived in India, half the Israeli team was scheduled to set up the field hospital – including operating rooms, X-ray equipment and pediatric care – to provide emergency medical services to the wounded. The other half will be conducting search-and-rescue missions in collapsed buildings.

IDF spokesperson Lt.-Col. Peter Lerner expected Israel's field hospital to be the first in operation in Nepal. In the past, the IDF has set up field hospitals following natural disasters in Haiti, the Philippines and Japan.

"It's one of the missions the IDF sees itself prepared for and willing to do," Lerner told JTA. "The Home Front Command is ultimately built to carry out evacuation-type scenarios in Israel, so they are planning and preparing and executing for buildings that have collapsed here. If we can take that knowledge and help people across the world who are in desperation, it's the right thing to do."

A separate, private mission organized by three Israeli emergency response organizations – United Hatzalah, Zaka and First Israel – left for Nepal on Sunday afternoon and aims to stay two to three weeks.

Along with search-and-rescue operations, the mission will provide basic medical care to far-flung villages near the quake's epicentre whose health clinics are either destroyed or saturated with wounded. IsraAid, which has sent aid missions to 28 countries, and Magen David Adom are also sending delegations.

In Kathmandu, Chabad Rabbi Chezki Lifshitz was in the middle of Torah reading on Saturday when he felt the ground shake. It was "as if a small windmill was underground and was moving the entire area," the rabbi said.

That night, by the end of the first phase the earthquake, hundreds of Israelis were crowded into Rabbi Lifshitz's courtyard, huddled in their tents and sleeping bags. Local hospitals were saturated with patients, so Rabbi Lifshitz recruited local doctors to treat lightly injured Israelis at his home.

"All the Israelis got here quickly and just stayed here in shock," Rabbi Lifshitz told the Israeli radio station Reshet Bet on Saturday night. "People were frightened and scared. The buildings here are swaying as if they're a leaf in the wind."

In Israel, friends and relatives of the missing hikers have shared photos and contact information on Facebook while coordinating an extensive grassroots search online. A Facebook page, Earthquake in Nepal, Updates and Search for Israelis, went live on Saturday evening, while a public Google spreadsheet is tracking information on the missing. The Kathmandu Chabad's Facebook page is also filled with photos and updates on missing Israelis.

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Oren Rozenblat estimates many missing Israelis are "out of touch" on hikes in remote regions, rather than wounded or killed.

"Hikers in Nepal don't call mom every day," Rozenblat said. "They may be in a place without reception, without a phone. That doesn't mean they have a problem. We don't know of any Israelis that need help, are wounded or need to be rescued."

For many Israelis, Nepal and other destinations in south Asia have been a place to unwind after military service and enjoy a more relaxed pace of life.

"It's recreation and leisure – it doesn't have the intensity that Israel has," said Chaim Noy, a professor of communications at the University of South Florida who wrote the 2007 book Narrative Community: Voices of Israeli Backpackers. ■

New attack on Syria blamed on Israel

JTA
JERUSALEM

An attack on the Syrian-Lebanese border blamed on Israel was the work of Syrian rebels, Israeli media reported citing unnamed Israeli defence sources.

The early Monday attack, which mimicked a Saturday night attack alleged to have been carried out by Israel, was blamed on Israel in Arab media reports on Monday morning, including by Al-Jazeera.

The second attack came several hours after four terrorists placing a bomb on Israel's border with Syria in the Golan Heights were killed in an Israel Air Force strike.

Arab media had reported over the weekend that Israel was responsible for an attack on Syrian territory, reported to be a convoy of long-range missiles in Syria that were intended for Hezbollah in northern Lebanon.

The IDF Spokespersons Unit neither confirmed nor denied any of the reports, saying it does not comment on foreign media reports.

Syria is in the midst of a more than four-year civil war between armed rebels and government forces loyal to Syrian President Bashar Assad. ■

Coalition near as Bennett drops Foreign Ministry demand

Netanyahu reportedly has already reached deal with Moshe Kahlon's Kulanu to join new government

THE TIMES OF ISRAEL

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu looked set to have the pieces needed to cobble together a new governing coalition, after Jewish Home leader Naftali Bennett reportedly dropped his demand for the Foreign Ministry Saturday night, likely removing a major stumbling block in coalition talks.

With just over a week to go for Netanyahu to form his coalition, Bennett will ask Likud for control of the Education Ministry instead of the highly coveted Foreign Ministry, which will reportedly stay in Yisrael Beitenu Leader Avigdor Liberman's hands.

The move will pave the way for the right-wing parties Jewish Home and Yisrael Beitenu to both join a Likud-led government, giving Netanyahu the last pieces he needs to form a coalition.

The prime minister has already all but formalized deals for Kulanu and ultra-Orthodox factions Shas and United Torah Judaism (UTJ) to come aboard, giving him a total of 67 seats.

Bennett and Netanyahu met April 24, with the prime minister reportedly offering up a raft of appointments. Netanyahu reportedly offered the Strategic Affairs Ministry, as well as the Economy Ministry, which he currently holds.

Jewish Home's No. 3, Ayelet Shaked, was said to be headed to the Ministry of Culture and Sport, and Uri Ariel was to receive the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development. The office he currently holds, the Ministry of Construction and Housing, was said to be earmarked for Kulanu member Yoav Galant.

The Orthodox-nationalist Jewish Home was also offered the role of deputy minister for one of its members in an unnamed ministry, and the chairmanship of a major Knesset committee, most likely the influential constitution, law and justice committee, Channel 2 reported.

While the Education Ministry was not among the posts offered, Netanyahu is thought to be open to giving Bennett the post in lieu of a more senior one.

A major stumbling block in talks has been Jewish Home's wrangling with Shas over the Religious Affairs portfolio, according to the TV report. Jewish Home held the office in the outgoing government, but Netanyahu's reported promise to now deliver the ministry to Aryeh Deri's ultra-Orthodox party had enraged Bennett.

According to Israel Radio, the Likud has offered a compromise by which the religious affairs minister will be from Shas, while his deputy will be a Bennett appointee.

Yisrael Beitenu has also presented Netanyahu with a problem, due to its staunch opposition to rolling back legislation on universal national service for the ultra-Orthodox and reforms of the state conversion and marriage registration systems, matters which Shas and UTJ seek to change. If Netanyahu concedes these issues to Shas and UTJ, party officials told Ynet that Yisrael Beitenu has no qualms about joining the opposition.

Likud negotiator Ze'ev Elkin called on Jewish Home and Yisrael Beitenu to compromise in order to form a government.

"We are on the home stretch, and if parties of the national camp [right-wing parties] want a government from the national camp to be formed, they need to move forward in the negotiation process," he told Israel Radio.

The prime minister had an easier time negotiating with Moshe Kahlon's Kulanu party, as an agreement between the two is reported to be all but finalized.

Netanyahu and Kahlon reportedly reached an agreement – just before Yom Hazikaron – on Kulanu joining the coalition. Kulanu will receive three ministries – Finance, Construction and Housing, and Environmental Protection. The prime minister is also said to have conceded to Kahlon's demand to shelve legislation that would restrict the powers of the Supreme Court, laws that Kahlon opposes.

The prime minister is facing a May 7 deadline to form a new government. Under Israeli election rules, if he fails to form a coalition by then, President Reuven Rivlin can ask another party leader to try. ■

The state of Israeli independence – 2015

Gerald Steinberg

Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day) is always an emotional roller-coaster, even after 67 years. For many Israelis, particularly the generation of founders, the restoration of Jewish sovereign equality among the nations is still a modern miracle.

At the same time, Israelis of all ages are reminded of the costs that we continue to bear in the face of irrational hatred, double standards and terror, which continue regardless of borders. This Memorial Day (Yom Hazikaron, April 22, this year), which is held on the day before Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israelis remembered and paid tribute to the 116 members of the security forces and more than 20 civilians who were killed in the past year. The recent war in Gaza, with the 4,560 rockets and mortars aimed at Israelis (each a war crime) and terror tunnels, remains firmly etched in Israel's collective memory.

But in some important ways, we have made progress in securing our freedom, particularly in pushing back against the political war based on demonization and BDS campaigns (boycott, divestment and sanctions). Recently, the Israeli High Court confirmed the validity of Knesset legislation making it possible to sue the promoters of discriminatory boycotts for damages. The majority opinion cited the evils of BDS, which outweigh the arguments based on free speech.

There has also been progress outside of Israel. On university campuses in North America, pro-Israel groups train students to stand up against the pro-Palestinian bullying. Through old-style newspaper articles and newer social media, particularly on Facebook and Twitter, the counter-attacks are hitting their targets.

The past year has seen the downfall of a main pillar of demonization. Until recently, the prestigious British journal The Lancet specialized in promoting false medical-related allegations under the façade of "scientific research." These allegations were then copied blindly by journalists and quoted in BDS resolutions.

In July 2014, editor Richard Horton published a scurrilous "letter to the people of Gaza" whose authors included blatant racists and anti-Semites. This time, the response, particularly from a number of the world's top doctors, was strong, demanding a retraction and apology. Under intense pressure, Horton and his circle of obsessive anti-Israel activists launched an awkward counterattack that erased the moral violations. This has highlighted Horton's failures and, most importantly, ended The Lancet's central role in demonization and BDS.

In the United Nations, where Israel is demonized by the 55-member Islamic bloc (including human rights stalwarts Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia), BDS and demonization campaigns are also stalling. After the 2014 Gaza war, the farcical Human Rights Council appointed William Schabas (originally from Canada), who has a long record of venom, to lead another attempt to find Israel guilty of "war crimes." But Schabas was caught hiding PLO links from his application to the United Nations, and was forced to resign. Although he boasted that his report has been completed, the new chair recognized that anything Schabas touched was tainted. As a result, yet another element in the BDS campaign was blunted.

In parallel, by naming and shaming key funders behind BDS, such as "human rights" groups in western European governments and unsupervised church aid frameworks, the amount of money available for this dirty war against Israel is gradually decreasing. Ten years ago, Canada set the precedent by cutting some $15 million in government grants to groups that used moral-sounding language to discriminate against Israel. The tens of millions still funnelled through German foundations, British "development aid" programs, a European human rights "secretariat" administered by a Palestinian BDS hub, among others, are being exposed and slowly cut-off.

Like the fight against terror, the political war that seeks to deny the rights of the Jewish People is difficult and complex, with successes and setbacks.

But we are getting much better at countering these forms of political warfare that single out Israel for attack. The emotional roller-coaster continues, but with more confidence in the future. ■

Toronto Jewish Music Week keeps on growing

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish Music Week is back this spring with larger daytime venues and new community partners. The popular annual festival, running this year from May 10 to 17, presents free daytime programs, including films, lectures, a panel discussion and concerts, and ticketed evening events, at venues in downtown Toronto and North York.

"We keep outgrowing our daytime venues, so we had to find places that are larger," said Aliza Spiro, who founded Jewish Music Week (JMW) in 2011 with her husband, Cantor Simon Spiro.

This year, the festival is presenting several events with some new partners. As well, five of the seven evening events are presented in partnership with synagogues. Zoomer Media, which partnered with JMW this year, will broadcast a live performance.

In partnership with the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA), Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre, JMW presents Toronto composer and singer Charles Heller performing his song cycle Tramway Lider (Street Car Songs), a musical setting of Yiddish poems written by the poet Shimen Nepom, who was a College Street streetcar conductor until his death in 1939.

Included in this event, at 10 a.m. on May 11 at First Narayever Congregation, is a slide presentation by the OJA about Jewish sites on College Street.

With the Azrieli Music Project (which has launched a competition for composers of Jewish orchestral music, with two $50,000 prizes), JMW is presenting, at noon on May 11 at Columbus Centre, a panel of Canadian musicians and musicologists discussing Jewish orchestral music, from Mahler and Mendelssohn to the current millennial composers.

In partnership with Zoomer Media, JMW presents Canadian millennial composer and pianist Adam Sherkin, performing classics and his own solo piano music at noon on May 14 at Zoomer Hall. The concert will be broadcast live on the radio station The New Classical 96.3.

"We realize that many people who love music are not mobile, so they can tune in and hear the entire event," Spiro said.

To complement the exhibit Photos from the Lodz Ghetto, JMW partners with the Art Gallery of Ontario, on May 17 at 2 p.m., to present vocalists from HaKol Ha'Ivri performing songs that would have been known and sung by the Jews living in the ghetto.

> We make it a point not to schedule musical programming on Shabbat

JMW opens this year with a tribute to the prolific Jewish composer Milton Barnes at 7:30 p.m. on May 10 at the Glenn Gould Studio. The composer's sons, Daniel and Micah, will share memories of their father at the concert.

The Wonderful World of Moishe Oysher, at 7:30 p.m. on May 12 at the St. Lawrence Centre, features Cantor Simon Spiro performing songs from Oysher's movies (he starred in a 1937 Yiddish movie called The Cantor's Son), his concert appearances and his jazzy cantorial albums.

On May 15 and May 16, JMW's musical Shabbat events will be held at Temple Har Zion, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Beth Sholom Congregation, where musicians, singers and singalongs will be featured. At Beth Emeth on May 15, Cantor David Edwards leads the service with musicians until Shabbat, when the instruments stop but the singing continues.

"We want to make sure that religious people can enjoy Jewish Music Week," said Aliza Spiro. "We make it a point not to schedule musical programming on Shabbat."

And after Shabbat ends, JMW presents a community melaveh malka and Banter with the Cantor at 10:15 p.m. on May 16, at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. Benjaimin Maissner, Tibor Kovari, Simon Spiro and Aaron Bensoussan, cantors from around the world who are now based in Toronto, will speak about their backgrounds, sing and lead a singalong. People are welcome to send any cantor/Jewish-music questions in advance to info@jewishmusicweek.com.

JMW isn't only about music, though. It's also about visual art. In 2011, when JMW launched its art contest, the festival received four submissions, Aliza Spiro said. This year the contest, called the Bogoroch Art Contest, received some 250 submissions from students in day and public schools, whose assignment was to draw the music of the Jewish holidays. The winning submissions will be exhibited from May 5 to 18 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre gallery.

A new category, artists of note, was created on the JMW website this year to acknowledge artists not included in the Miles Nadal exhibit. Grade 8 Bialik Hebrew Day School student Robyn Beallor received an award of excellence for her stark grey-and-white drawing of Jews in concentration-camp bunks.

"I was thinking about how music can help people through the worst of times and we always find a way to celebrate the holidays," Robyn said. "I would like the viewer to notice that this is during the Holocaust where they are celebrating Shabbat with potatoes as candles."

The winning artworks were, for grades 6 and 7, by Billie Wilner, left, and by Matthew Kalman, right, for grades 1 and 2.

Other Jewish Music Week highlights:

• Sefarad – three cantors, Ramon Tasat, Natasha Hirschhorn and Tibor Kovari, perform liturgical, Ladino, folk and modern Mizrachi-style songs at 8 p.m. on May 11 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

• Jazz guitarist Stan Samole, who draws upon modern jazz, swing, folk, pop, reggae and blues, entertains at noon on May 13, in the main floor atrium of Princess Margaret Cancer Centre. Cantor Tibor Kovari and singer Kati Kovari lead a singalong, with dancing, to celebrate the anniversary of the declaration of the establishment of the State of Israel, May 14 at 2 p.m. at the Miles Nadal JCC.

• What's It All About, The Burt Bacharach and Hal David Songbook, is on at 8 p.m. on May 14 at Hugh's Room.

• Ruth Lowe's son, Tom Sandler, gives a presentation about his mother, who wrote the hit song I'll Never Smile Again for Frank Sinatra, at 10 a.m. on May 15 at the Barbara Frum Library.

• Mahler on the Couch, a movie about the composer, his wife, her lover and Sigmund Freud, will be shown at 10:30 a.m. on May 17 at Hang Loose Media.

• Julius: Yiddish Barbershop Quartet made up of Josh Dolgin (Socalled), Anthony Russell, Mitch Smolkin and David Wall, performs at 7 p.m. on May 17 at Temple Sinai. ■

Soul of Israeli music scene to perform in Toronto

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Israeli pop star Shlomi Shabat, known as the neshamah, or soul, of the Israeli music scene, is coming to Toronto in May to both entertain and give the Jewish community an opportunity to connect to Israeli culture.

On May 7, Shabat, accompanied by a 12-piece ensemble and special guest, Toronto-based duo Scarlett Jane, will perform at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre.

The event, put together by Motek Cultural Initiative, a non-profit organization that has been showcasing contemporary Israeli music in Toronto since 2009, lands on Lag b'Omer, the only night during the Sefirah when music can be enjoyed.

"This is an opportunity for many to experience the way we in Israel celebrate this holiday and to bring the Jewish and Israeli communities of Toronto closer together," said Ravid Dahan, founder of the Motek Cultural Initiative.

She said part of her mission is to bring talented Israeli musicians to Toronto's multicultural community to foster an appreciation for Israeli culture and to use music as a tool to present Israel in a more positive light.

"Motek has two goals leading its mission the reason why I go to work every day. First is to reveal a positive image of Israel," Dahan said.

"It doesn't make sense to me that knowledgeable people in Canada don't see Israel with the same eyes that I see Israel. It doesn't make sense to me."

The second part of her mission is to help the next generation of Israelis in Toronto develop a connection to Israel.

"For example, with the ISROCK Festival in 2013, Motek brought Tel Aviv to Toronto. This time around, Motek saves you another trip to Israel, by bringing the soul of Israeli sound to your doorstep."

Dahan said she wanted to bring Shabat to Toronto because he represents the soul of Israeli music.

"He is the neshamah of the Israeli music. His songs, people grew up on them for, like, three generations. I will enjoy it, my kids will enjoy it, and my father will enjoy it. Everyone will know the songs."

Sixty-year-old Shabat, who has been entertaining Israelis for three decades, produced 18 rock albums influenced by Mediterranean, Latin, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, Turkish, and Ladino music.

Shlomi Shabat

Shabat, who serves as a mentor on the Israeli version of the show, The Voice, said he's excited to perform for Israelis living abroad.

"Each song and each lyric takes on a stronger meaning and significance," wrote Shabat in an email, which was translated from Hebrew.

"This puts me in a position where I want to put on a better show, because I know that they won't be able to see me as often as those who live in Israel."

"My music really speaks to people of all ages – children, teens, young adults and older people," said Shabat, whose rise to fame began in the 1980's, when he pioneered a new fusion of Mediterranean rock, blues, and Spanish music.

"I also know how to connect to the younger generation in regards to my sound and new style. I think it's a blessing that I can learn to adjust and not to give up my musical inspirations, and on the other hand, also connect to the younger generation and deliver what they want to hear... I think that is why the audience feels it's easy and fun to connect with me and for me to connect with them."

He said he hopes that the people who come to see him perform will be left with a feeling of longing for Israel.

"I have performed before in Toronto and I very much enjoy performing here, because this community is very warm and welcoming," he said. ■

Tarragon production blends Bollywood and the Bard

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Shakespeare and Bollywood aren't often thought of in tandem. But Tarragon Theatre's adaption of Much Ado About Nothing blends the two together.

"The essential relationships from Shakespeare's play are all there. And the wonderful fireworks of wit are as present as ever," says Alon Nashman, who plays Benedict (or Benedick in the original Shakespearean text). Instead of taking place in Italy, the piece has been relocated to Brampton, Ont., and it's filled with Bollywood-style music and dancing.

"Everything has this extra little lustre," says Nashman, "and a kind of new cultural and societal meaning." For Nashman, it acknowledges the diversity of Toronto and the distinct cultural groups that call this city home.

"The mixing and melding of those is what makes us so rich and so fascinating," he says. "It absolutely works here. It makes the play richer, it makes the play funnier and in a certain sense, better."

Along with the Bollywood elements, some of the show's text reflects its new setting. "We're not being precious about maintaining references to medieval dancing or Latin jokes or that kind of thing. We're trying to make it absolutely current." Much of the text is still Shakespearean, but parts of it have been translated into Hindi and the show will have surtitles. Many characters, such as Benedict's love interest, have also been renamed.

Nashman describes his character as a "confirmed bachelor" and a "rationalist" who rejects the concept of marriage – until he falls in love with Thara, or Beatrice in the Bard's version. "He has a change of heart," says Nashman. "And it's one of the most incredible transformations perhaps an actor would ever have a chance to play."

Beyond playing Benedict, Nashman never thought he'd be part of a production such as this. "When director Richard Rose first offered it to me, I wrote him back and said, 'do I get to sing and dance Bollywood style?'" Rose said yes and Nashman was in. For an actor used to working with Jewish subject matter – he's well known for his solo shows Hirsch and Kafka and Son, among many other theatre credits – Nashman says that for once, he didn't feel like the expert in the room.

Alon Nashman

Much Ado About Nothing's reimagined production is directed by the award-winning Richard Rose, who's also the artistic director of Tarragon Theatre. Ravi Jain is the consulting director and the show features original music by Ed Hanley and Suba Sankaran – both part of the Juno-nominated group Autorickshaw – and choreography by Nova Bhattacharya. "We're awash with experts," says Nashman, referring to how he learned to perform in the Bollywood style.

After his run with Tarragon Theatre, Nashman is taking Hirsch, co-written with Paul Thompson, and Kafka and Son co-created with Mark Cassidy – to the National Arts Festival in Grahamstown, South Africa and the 969 Festival in Johannesburg.

Meanwhile, Nashman hopes audiences will reflect on the unique wonder that is multicultural Toronto when watching Tarragon's Much Ado About Nothing. "There is an immense power to being in a room together," he says of theatre. And he knows this play will let Torontonians celebrate who they are. ■

Memoir traces European art world in early 20th century

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Born in New York in 1948, the prominent French-Jewish journalist Anne Sinclair says that while the heroic stories of her paternal grandparents, who had stayed in France during wartime, had always resonated deeply within her, she was never drawn to the same degree to the experiences of her maternal grandparents, who had fled to New York in the same perilous period.

But all that changed after her mother died in 2006, and Sinclair delved into several boxes of her mother's letters, documents and photographs that had lain untouched for decades. The contents included an unfinished autobiography of her maternal grandfather, Paul Rosenberg, who had owned an influential art gallery in Paris and had been one of the most important art dealers in Europe until the Nazis rolled into Paris in June 1940.

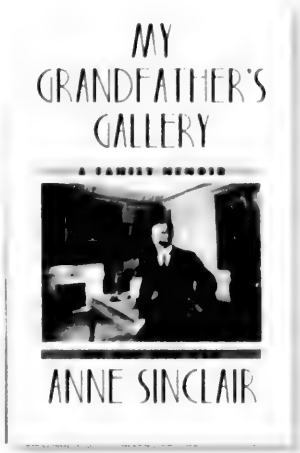
In My Grandfather's Gallery: A Family Memoir of Art and War, Sinclair pays homage to this pivotal figure in the art world of the early 20th century, who was on intimate terms with some of the leading artists of the early modernist period. She also traces the Nazi's atavistic campaign against "degenerate art" and their brutish pillage of Europe, especially their looting on a massive scale of artworks belonging to Jews.

The notion that art could be "degenerate" had been circulating in European culture at least since 1893, when Jewish social critic Max Nordau used the word "Entartung" or "degeneracy" in reference to art. In his famous critical work Degeneration, Nordau observed that modern art at the end of the 19th century was a mirror in which one could see clear signs of the breakdown of traditional social values as well as the various mental diseases, neuroses and hysterias of European society. The modernist trend, of course, became greatly magnified after World War I.

As early as 1909, Kaiser Wilhelm may have been one of the first to apply Nordau's ideas to the real world when he fired the director of a major gallery for buying impressionist paintings. The concept of "degenerate art" gained renewed currency in the 1920s when a group of philosophers invoked the phrase in protest against modernism. After 1933, the Nazis took the next logical step by banning "degenerate" works and expropriating them wherever possible. Artists were forbidden not only to show or sell their works, but even to buy brushes, canvases or paint; many went into exile.

Widely considered the epicenter of the Paris avant-garde, the Galerie Rosenberg at 21 rue La Boetie was famous for its displays of paintings by Picasso, Braque, Derain, Matisse, Leger, Laurencin, Toulouse-Lautrec, Ingres, Cezanne, Seurat, Rousseau, Monet and Renoir.

Both born in the same year (1881), Rosenberg and Picasso were extremely close and saw each other as "spiritual brothers." Picasso sketched portraits of members of the art dealer's family; Rosenberg picked canvases straight from the artist's studio and personally hung them in his gallery for each of the many solo Picasso exhibitions he organized over the years. "If Picasso's painting took off in the 1920s, it did so not least because Paul knew how to promote the painter and guide him in directions other than cubism," Sinclair writes of her grandfather.



My Grandfather's Gallery: A Family Memoir of Art and War
Anne Sinclair
Farrar Strauss & Giroux

In 1939, just weeks before the outbreak of war, the Germans held an auction in Lucerne of 126 paintings and sculptures that had been confiscated from museums and private collections in Germany. "Many collectors, unable to resist the temptation to buy outstanding works of art at low prices, attended," Sinclair writes. "Paul warned potential buyers that any currency the Reich harvested from this sale 'would fall back on our heads in the form of bombs.' "

It was another, unrelated Rosenberg – the Nazi propagandist Alfred Rosenberg – who led the National Socialist campaign against degeneracy, which included any form of physical distortion of the human being in art. Alfred Rosenberg took over Paul Rosenberg's well-appointed gallery and used it as headquarters for the anti-Semitic Institut d'Etude des Questions Juives, the Institute for the Study of Jewish Questions. Alfred Rosenberg also set up the Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg, the chief organization in the looting operation against Parisian art dealers and Jewish owners. The booty was taken to the Louvre and another museum where it was photographed, evaluated, and wrapped for shipment to Germany.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Dancing Arabs and The Kindergarten Teacher

Unique students at the centre of two very different Israeli dramas

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two of the hottest, most anticipated titles at this spring's Toronto Jewish Film Festival deal with unique students and their tumultuous experiences at Jewish schools.

Dancing Arabs, based on a bestselling novel by Sayed Kashua, tells the story of a brainy Palestinian teen who gets a scholarship to a prestigious Israeli academy. The Kindergarten Teacher, from award-winning director Nadav Lapid, is about a lonely teacher and the prodigal pupil she yearns to nurture and inspire.

While Dancing Arabs opens the festival on April 30, The Kindergarten Teacher (playing May 5 at Empress Walk and May 9 at Innis Town Hall) is more of a must-see. Regardless, both are strong Israeli dramas that are well worth your time.

The dancing Arabs of the former's title are a reference to how Arab citizens in Israel must constantly dodge social and political obstacles. The drama focuses on the teenage Eyad (Tawfeek Barhom) in the late 1980s and early 1990s. His father, Salah (Ali Suliman), is proud of his son for being accepted into a top Israeli high school.

"I want you to be better than them," Salah tells his son, referring to the Israelis, "in every way!"

Soon after his arrival at the academy, though, Eyad realizes he is the only Arab in his class. He tries to hide his past in an attempt not to offend or attract unwanted attention. Tension arises when he begins a romantic relationship with Naomi (Danielle Kitzis), a Jewish student whose parents would never approve of Eyad.

Dancing Arabs is the latest film from director Eran Riklis (Lemon Tree, Zaytoun), and the drama benefits from a uniformly terrific cast. Barhom, a relatively unknown, anchors the film. He is especially magnetic in the scenes when Eyad directly confronts the school's stereotyping of Israel's enemies.

Kashua, who based the novel on some of his own experiences in Israel, also penned the screenplay. The film benefits from his sharp observations of how alienated Arabs feel in the land. Some of the best scenes in Dancing Arabs are between Eyad and Jonathan (Michael Moshanov), a Jewish friend with muscular dystrophy. The two boys bond over their outsider status at school.

While the film has some pointed social commentary about Jewish-Arab relations, Eyad too rarely voices his anger. One gets the feeling that Riklis and Kashua dulled some of the novel's more provocative moments.

Regardless, Dancing Arabs is a well-acted drama that should resonate with audiences looking for an honest depiction of Arab-Israeli life.

Meanwhile, for Torontonians looking for something more daring, The Kindergarten Teacher will likely be one of the festival's most talked-about films. It deserves comparison with the best films from art-house directors Jean-Pierre and Luc Dardenne (Two Days, One Night).

Dancing Arabs* tells the story of an Arab Israeli and his tumultuous experiences at an elite Israeli high school. The drama opens the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on April 30.

A hit at the Cannes Film Festival last year, Nadav Lapid's drama focuses on Nira (Sarit Larry), a kindergarten teacher bored with her job and her husband. However, when she finds out that a new student, five-year-old Yoav (Avi Shnaidman), can recite original, startlingly good poetry, she tries to mentor the young prodigy.

Lapid's film begins as an inspirational drama and slowly morphs into an unsettling thriller. Larry gives a tour de force performance. Even though her character becomes increasingly hard to like, her layered performance ensures one can understand her sadness and sympathize with Nira's journey.

Meanwhile, the young Shnaidman is outstanding in his film debut: natural, nuanced and completely believable. Despite the kindergarten setting, the film contains nudity and sexual content, and is not suitable for children.

Much of the film's success is due to its realist esthetic. Cinematographer Shai Goldman shoots much of the film by placing the camera on the same level as the children in Nira's class. Told from this perspective, the story becomes more intimate. These close-up observations bottle up both the playfulness and the raw emotions in the classroom, making it difficult to look away.

At other times, we look at the world from Yoav's point of view. When he swings upside down in the playground, we notice the overwhelming beauty of the sky and trees he sees. The purity and innocence of these moments contrast with the stark realism of the scenes from Nira's perspective, showing the distance between the characters.

Lapid and his crew drain many of the sets — the classroom, Nira's apartment — of colour. This allows for Yoav's powerful poems to have more vitality, since he projects them in such sad, empty rooms.

Many will be disturbed and surprised by some of the plot turns in the film's second half. The ending should spark a lot of conversation. The Kindergarten Teacher is hypnotic, thought-provoking filmmaking. ■

Jewish pioneers in the motion picture business

The Motion Picture Owners of Ontario rally in Toronto in September, 1926 ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES, BLANKENSTEIN FAMILY HERITAGE CENTRE FONDS

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of the great stories of Toronto's Jewish community involves the large number of Jews who were pioneers in the Canadian film industry. That story is still largely untold, awaiting the right historian to fit all the pieces together. In the meantime, some key items that help to illuminate the tale are available at the Ontario Jewish Archives Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre.

Hye Bossin's 1956 booklet Stars of David might be a good place to start. Bossin's "very casual account of the Jewish element in the theatre history of Toronto" deals with the stage as well as the cinema, and records that the American actor Emanuel Judah may have been the first Jewish actor to play a leading role in Toronto. (The venue was Frank's Hotel and the year was 1826, when the city was still officially known as York.)

Some chapters later, Bossin turns to film and makes the following observation: "Perhaps the story of the Allens is the first Canadian one worthy of becoming a chapter in the motion picture industry's volume of great accomplishments."

The saga of the Allen's theatre empire began more than a century ago, when Bernard Allen of Pennsylvania sent two of his sons, Jule and J.J., northward to Ontario to find a commercial space suitable for a nickelodeon. The boys were 18 and 17 years old respectively. "They came up in [1906 or] 1907 and they opened a theatre in Brantford, Ont." recalled their sister-in-law, Bertha Allen, wife of Herbert Allen, in a 1975 taped interview. "They had rented a store and put in chairs and started running some films. The charge was five cents."

Soon the Allens opened another local theatre and the entire family moved to Brantford; then came a theatre in Calgary and the family moved out west.

Hye Bossin continues the story. "The progress of the Allens was astounding. In a decade and a half the fistful of nickels that marked the opening of the [Brantford] Theatorium in 1906 grew into a $20 million investment in about 50 theatres, including one each in Britain and Russia and several in the United States, as well as a film distribution organization.

"Not many years after they entered the motion picture business the Allen family settled in Toronto, where its members built the city's finest cinemas, among them the Tivoli, Parkdale, College, St. Clair, Beach and Hollywood."

But competition was stiff, especially after American-born entrepreneur Nathan L. Nathanson purchased the grand Majestic Theatre on Adelaide Street in 1916 and converted it into the Regent, Toronto's first deluxe movie palace. This was the first in the Famous Players chain of theatres that Nathanson and his associates built across the country. American film mogul Adolph Zukor was another shark who battled the Allens for film distribution rights in Canada.

Bossin mentions numerous other pioneers, including Manuel Gebertig, Jacob Smith, Abner Appleby, Charles and Hyman Rotenberg, Morris Mentel, Harry Alexander and Sam Lester. The latter two who were my father's uncles – and Mentel were in business together. "During the day they ran a little cloak-and-suit manufacturing business, with Harry, who had come from England in 1909, as designer and salesman," Bossin records. "Within a few years they were operating a half-dozen theatres."

Besides the taped discussion with Bertha Allen, the OJA holds interviews with Sol Gebirtig, Jennie Goldstein and other informed parties. It also holds historic photos such as a 1926 group portrait of the Motion Picture Theatre Owners of Ontario which had a predominance of Jewish members – among them the Lesters, Harry Alexander, Jake Smith, Isadore Stern, Sam Ulster, Abe Pollakoff, Irving Field, Joe Cohen, Arthur Cohen, probably an Axler or two, and Samuel Bloom of Bloom and Fine. (The formidable B&I chain, which arose in the 1920s, included the Carlton, Century, Christie, Donlands and Vaughan theatres.)

Also among the OJA's holdings are numerous photos of theatres, the Eglinton among them, designed or renovated by the architectural firm of Kaplan & Sprachman. Other items relate to later generations of film-industry entrepreneurs such as Nat Taylor and Garth Drabinsky. These and other artifacts will certainly be of use when the right historian comes along to tell the important story of the Jewish pioneers who helped to build the motion picture business in Canada. ■

This is the fifth in a series of articles to be published periodically about Toronto's Jewish institutions, funded by the J. B. & Dora Salsberg Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. This series is in partnership with the Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre and draws on their collections: www.ontariojewisharchives.org

By then, Paul Rosenberg had already put some of his artworks into storage under the name of his non-Jewish chauffeur, and had sent other pieces abroad. He also helped to prepare the first big Picasso retrospective at the Museum of Modern Art in New York and a Picasso exhibition at the Art Institute in Chicago in 1939 and 1940. "Paul loaned more than 30 canvases" to these exhibitions, Sinclair writes, "which meant these paintings had escaped the clutches of the Nazis."

More importantly, Rosenberg and his family also escaped the Nazi's clutches, having fled to Portugal as refugees. Here's how he described the experience in his diary: "Imagine a man who has everything in life ... and who, a week later, has lost his business, his fortune, his friends. I was sitting on a stone wall with a boiled egg and a crust of bread and I couldn't help laughing." Eventually the family made it to London and then New York.

With the topic of looted artworks and restitution central to the current film Woman in Gold and numerous other recent books and movies, My Grandfather's Gallery appears at a time of heightened interest in the subject. (The book was originally published in French in 2012, and came out in English translation in 2014.)

The story, which combines a Jewish family's dramatic wartime saga with an insider's view of the art world, bears parallels with Edmund de Waal's 2010 family memoir, The Hare With the Amber Eyes.

Sinclair's book also bears comparison with a biography of Edna Ferber that I once read in which the author decided to tell her subject's life in backwards order; it was an experiment that did not work. Sinclair doesn't exactly follow that plan but, in my opinion, she undercuts the power of her narrative significantly by not telling the story in chronological order. For this reason, I turned a lot of pages before warming to the story – the heart of which is the relationship between Rosenberg and Picasso. ■

Encountering GCGs – Genuinely Curious Gentiles

David Levine

"Are you Jewish?" a random stranger asked me recently. When I said yes, he pumped his fist in victory. "I can always spot you guys. Don't worry," he said. "I like Jews." And that was the least awkward part of our conversation, for I had just encountered a GCG: a Genuinely Curious Gentile.

GCGs are good people, the kind who make friends on airplanes, bring gifts for receptionists and have never sent back a meal. Under different circumstances, you might even enjoy their company, but, as the name suggests, their genuine curiosity also frees them from the strictures of polite conversation. This guide to your next GCG encounter is designed to help you navigate the process with maximum grace and politeness.

Stage 1: the approach

GCGs aren't generally subtle. You'll be able to tell when one has awkwardly set his or her gaze on you.

She will attempt to communicate (from a distance) that she "just" wants something. "Just a second," he will say, or "I just wanted to ask…" If ignored, the GCG will reinforce the urgency of his breeziness through pantomime and/or wildly inappropriate vocal volume.

There's not much you can do here. Escape is tricky and not always an option (e.g., with co-workers, extended family). If your GCG sees you eyeing the exit, he'll decide he simply must catch you before you leave, picking up his pace, and – because he's still staring at you – plowing enthusiastically through everything below eye level as he approaches, sweaty and grinning at the thought of meeting Jew – I mean you.

Stage 2: "...right??"

Brace yourself – the real awkwardness starts now. First, your GCG will need to confirm your (Jewish) status –plowing into "You're Jewish, right?" before doubling back, concerned, with "Is it OK to ask that?" and "I don't mean it as a bad thing."

You'll be so unable to hide your discomfort that your GCG may actually notice. Never fear! You'll be reassured that your GCG "knows a lot of Jews" and has "been to synagogue," so all is well.

Stage 3: the "point"

Now that your GCG has thoroughly embarrassed you (not himself – he's immune to that) and confirmed that he is speaking to a Jew, your GCG will (attempt to) arrive at his point. Invariably, these comments break down into four broad categories: aggressive hatred, geopolitical insight, unidentifiable ramblings, and vaguely racist compliments.

Can you spot the GCGs in your life? Use the real-life examples below to practise:

"You Jews have done great for yourselves."

"My friends and I figured out how to have peace in the Middle East."

"Is it true about the sheets?"

"I tell everyone: always use Jews as your doctors and lawyers. They fight, fight, fight for you."

"Is it true about the horns?"

"I heard William Shatner is Jewish. Have you met him?"

"I think it's great how you control the media."

Stage 4: the reply

Your GCG has been talking at you for so long the room is empty. You can't remember how (or when) the conversation started. You've been nodding and agreeing so much it feels like a visit to your grandparents. Suddenly, there's a lull, and you notice your GCG has stopped talking and is looking at you, expectantly, awaiting a reply.

This will surprise you: the GCG has rambled so wildly and at such length that the concept of dialogue has slipped from your mind. What to say? Your GCG has covered Jewish physiology, 9/11 conspiracy theories, recipes for hummus and the short-lived 90s sitcom Phenom.

You might now be telling yourself: "Just focus on the dumbest thing they said and correct it. Maybe you can start somewhere. However, your GCG isn't likely to care. He's already started mentally retelling the story to a friend ("Guess who I just met!").

Reply politely, but don't engage. Make your way to an exit while using platitudes such as "I never thought of if that way," "It's a really complicated situation," "Who can say?" and "Hindsight is 50/50" before running to safety. ■

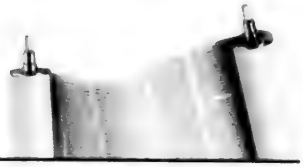
Acharei Mot-Kedoshim | Leviticus 16:1 – 20:27



Rabbi Aaron Katchen explains the moral imperative that we build each other up
Rabbi Michal Shekel reflects on the various causes to which we dedicate our children
Rabbi Howard Morrison connects this week's reading to Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut

Aaron Katchen

Michal Shekel

Howard Morrison

"You shall not curse a deaf person. You shall not place a stumbling block before a blind person, and you shall fear your God. I am the Lord" (Leviticus 19:14)

Chapter 19 of Leviticus is one of my favourite sections of Torah to teach, especially to people learning Torah for the first time. It covers the gamut of how we should relate to God, to the land and to each other.

Verse 14 presents a deep statement on the literal level and an even more important lesson when unpacked. We are charged not to curse the deaf or trip the blind (lifnei iver) – sage advice not to mock people with disabilities.

But that is not the limit of our understanding of this verse. The rabbis teach us that an absent person is akin to a deaf person and cannot defend himself or herself. As well, we all suffer from our own "blindnesses," whether from lack of knowledge or from weakness. Having "blindness" is part of the human condition, and we are obligated not to take advantage of others' weaknesses by putting metaphorical stumbling blocks before them – whether for our own benefit or for the demise of others. It is a moral imperative to build each other up and not look for ways to tear each other down.

Although you will be reading this more than a week later, I am writing this on the evening of the passing of one of the most important rabbis in my life, Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein. The world is greater for the Torah he brought in, but I already feel his absence. One of the earliest teachings of Rabbi Lichtenstein that I learned had to do with lifnei iver and Shabbat, and so I dedicate this piece in his memory. May his memory be a blessing. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen is associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Among the instructions in this week's double parshah, one particular warning appears twice. Acharei Mot cautions us: "Do not allow any of your offspring to be offered up to Molech, and do not profane the name of your God." (Leviticus 18:21) Kedoshim takes the warning to another level: "Anyone among the Israelites or among the strangers residing in Israel, who gives any of his offspring to Molech, shall be put to death." (Leviticus 20:2)

The Hebrew verb n-t-n, "to give," used to describe offering the child, implies devoting or dedicating the child to the cult of Molech. In Hilchot Avodah Zarah 6:3, Rambam explains this not as a fatal sacrifice but a ritual where the child is handed back and forth between parent and priest. Though the action takes place under the direction of Molech's priest it is the parent who initiates it.

The thought of offering a child in any way is abhorrent to us. Still, these two verses force us to contemplate the causes to which we dedicate our children. How often do we zealously commit our offspring to attaining our hopes and dreams while claiming we are fulfilling their wishes? Is the higher-level sports league really that important? Is the big-name school such a good fit?

Acharei Mot-Kedoshim forms a powerful guide to moral adult behaviour and has repercussions for our offspring. Leviticus 19 gives numerous examples of ethical behaviour toward a variety of people: parents, the rich and poor, merchants, the elderly, the differently abled. Leviticus 18 and 20 deal with the boundaries of sexual encounters. Nestled among these are the admonitions about Molech.

Our double parshah can be summed up as "don't exploit." This includes not offering our children to the modern idols of dubious success and fleeting admiration we may mistakenly desire for them. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

The double portion of Acharei Mot-Kedoshim provides some of the most famous ideals in Judaism and has additional meaning in contemporary Jewish life.

The midpoint of the Torah centres around the golden rule of Judaism, "Love thy neighbour as thyself," and restates the Ten Commandments. These timeless observations are augmented by the fact that the double portion is read soon after the observances of Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

One interpretation takes three successive parshah titles and reads them as a sentence. "Acharei Mot, Kedoshim and Emor" literally mean "after one's death, one speaks of a person's holiness." We honour the memories of our holy ones who sanctified their lives through their deaths during the Shoah and on behalf of Israel.

We also recall the Hadrianic persecutions and the deaths of thousands of our people. The double portion is read during the same period that we count the Omer and observe restrictions in memory of that sad time in our history. A few days following Acharei Mot-Kedoshim and two days before Parshat Emor, we celebrate Lag b'Omer, the day the persecutions paused.

This season of the calendar can be seen as an emotional roller-coaster ride from the depths of despair to the heights of joyous celebration. At the centre of it is Acharei Mot-Kedoshim.

Toward the end of Kedoshim, we read, "I [God] will give [the land of Israel] to you to possess, a land flowing with milk and honey." At the end of the Haftorah, we read, "I will restore My people Israel. They shall rebuild ruined cities and inhabit them; they shall plant vineyards and drink their wine; they shall till gardens and eat their fruits. And I will plant them upon their soil, nevermore to be uprooted from the soil I have given them." May this be God's will in our time. ■

Rabbi Deborah Waxman: Reconstructionism has an expansive view of Judaism

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Deborah Waxman, who was appointed head of the Reconstructionist movement and president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC), the movement's seminary, last year, is both the first woman and the first lesbian to lead a Jewish seminary and a major Jewish movement.

Rabbi Waxman, who is based in Wyncote, Pa., was in Toronto last month visiting the Reconstructionist synagogue Congregation Darchei Noam, where she met with congregants and discussed the future of the movement. She also attended the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association's 40th annual convention, which was being held in Toronto.

The CJN spoke to her about social justice issues, intermarriage, the movement's challenges and her sense of responsibility as its leader.

Can you describe the process that saw you become head of the movement?

I was appointed president by the board of the RRC in October 2013, officially began in the role in January 2014 and was inaugurated in October 2014.

In June 2012, the Reconstructionist movement moved beyond the classical denominational model and combined the congregational union with the leadership training institution that the college is, so now it's one organization that works together as the agency responsible for promoting a Reconstructionist approach, fostering congregations and training leaders.

I read that you visited 14 congregations in your first nine months as RRC president. What's been your largest takeaway from that experience?

Now, 15 months in, I've been to 27 congregations, and by the end of the program year, I'll have been to over 30.

My biggest takeaway is the vitality, energy and deeply caring community I consistently find in congregations organized around Reconstructionism. I find the people who belong to these communities take a sense of joyful obligation around creating a Jewish community they want to live in.

These are communities that are always looking to increase opportunities to celebrate together, support each other through crises, learn and grow together and be change agents in the world – there's a strong tikkun olam component in Reconstructionism. My responsibility as leader of the movement is to make sure the resources gathered at the rabbinical college are able to support these efforts, to connect congregations and make it possible to share best practices among congregations at similar points in their life cycle – for example, for two congregations facing hiring their first rabbi to be able to speak to one another.

In what ways has Reconstructionist Judaism been a trailblazer for social justice issues like women's rights and LGBTQ rights?

On a national movement level, we're looking to make a contribution that isn't fulfilled by other Jewish organizations, such as promoting conversations about income inequality in North America and Israel. On a local level, many congregations are involved in things like building partnerships through multifaith or legislative-based organizations. And most Reconstructionist synagogues have some kind of tikkun olam committee. For example, in Portland, Oregon, they're working on environmental justice issues.

The movement has also been committed to trying to find ways for women to be included in Jewish life and leadership. There's a commitment to democracy and egalitarianism – to finding a way for all Jews to participate meaningfully in Jewish life.

We were the first seminary to admit gay and lesbian Jews to study for the rabbinate, and we developed protocols for welcoming queer Jews and acknowledging that children raised by one Jewish parent in an interfaith household can have an affirmative and positive embrace of a Jewish identity and a place in the Jewish community. Reconstructionism adopted a policy on patrilineal descent in 1966, meaning a child raised in a Jewish home with one Jewish parent is considered a full Jew. We have an expansive view of Judaism that aims to draw people in.

What's unique about the Reconstructionist approach to intermarriage?

I believe that in the modern era, where there's such an incredible embrace of Jews in North America and, on this continent, no particular barriers to our full participation in mainstream society – for sure, with some exceptions – any expression of Jewishness is a choice. And we have to help people understand all the opportunities and affirm that there are diverse expressions and practices of Jewish identity. We can take none of it for granted.

It's just so easy for Jews in North America to disappear into the mainstream. So I, and the movement as a whole, are most interested in building up rich expressions of all choices than we are in policing boundaries, in affirming people who embrace Jewish families and practices, even if they don't adhere to strict halachic categories. We should support their efforts to find a deeper connection. It's extraordinary the Jews and Jewish leaders that emerge from people who'd otherwise be excluded if we took the narrowest definition of Jewish.

> I feel my work is about making the case not just for Reconstructionist Judaism, but for progressive Judaism and progressive religion at large.

What are the biggest challenges currently facing Reconstructionist Judaism?

The openness of our movement is an extraordinary gift and has allowed for flourishing opportunities that Jews a couple centuries ago couldn't have imagined, but it also creates a challenging environment. There's a whole restructuring going on in all sectors of society, including the changing nature of religious structures. Where 50 to 100 years ago, Jews were Jews whether or not they wanted to be, now I think there's this moment of "Why belong to anything?" "Why should a synagogue belong to a denominational organization?" and for many people – especially young people – "Why be Jewish?" So I feel my work is about making the case not just for Reconstructionist Judaism, but for progressive Judaism and progressive religion at large.

In the United States, there's definitely an ever-increasing divide between radical secularism and fundamentalism, so it's a challenge to advocate for a progressive religious approach.

Have you noticed differences in Reconstructionist synagogues in the United States versus those in Canada?

I feel like in terms of the embrace of a Reconstructionist approach, there aren't tons of differences. The same types of people tend to be drawn to the movement across the border. I think communities in both places want to be flag-bearers for progressive Judaism and I see a lot of shared enthusiasm in both Canada and the U.S.

How does being both a woman and a lesbian enable you to be a strong role model in the movement?

Being head of the movement is a tremendous honour, and I'm keenly aware that I'm a role model. I aim to fulfil this with as much humility as possible. Otherwise, I don't see being a gay woman as having an impact. I'm aware that I'm the first, and people have been overwhelmingly excited and enthusiastic about my appointment. ■

Adam: male and female?

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN

In Genesis, we read that "God created man in His image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them." We also read that "on the day that God created man, He made him in the likeness of God; He created them male and female."

The image in the Torah of an ostensibly androgynous Adam – male and female appears problematic to say the least. I would like to suggest that this image may evoke the idea that it is the essential humanity of both that is paramount in the Divine scheme of things. God created one man so all future generations would – or should – understand that people are different, but that ultimately, we come from the same Source and should conduct ourselves in full awareness of this essential truth.

So, too, men and women are to live their lives aware that each has a claim to an essential and fundamental dignity that must be respected because it, too, emanates from the Divine Source. The Torah itself seems to be underlining the inherent integrity of each and every man and woman from the very inception of Creation.

Degradation of women violates in the most grotesque way the very essence of the Divine will. If this principle were understood and applied by religious and civil authorities, much suffering in the world would be alleviated.

Maybe there is an even greater point being made by this unique and enigmatic creation of a dual self. If Adam is the whole world in microcosm, male and female, then he is also the embodiment of all the future nations as well. If it is true that he represents the Torah's ideal of female as well as male dignity and integrity, then by extension he must also represent the right to dignity of all humankind, of all peoples.

When one people or one nation demonizes or dehumanizes another in order to subjugate it, civilized people refer to this as a primitive trait or primal urge, but perhaps it is the exact opposite. The Torah seems to be saying that the primal urge should be toward unity and brotherhood and that any deviation from that Divine model is an egregious perversion of the Divine will.

> The Torah seems to be saying that the primal urge should be toward unity and brotherhood

The history of the world is the history of war. Man is said to be an inherently aggressive being. Indeed, Genesis itself records murder, foretelling future events. However, it would appear that the Torah is saying that this is not the natural state, it is not inevitable, it is not condoned. The blood soaked history of the world is a hideous travesty of everything the Torah represents and strives to teach.

When we say Shema Yisrael, HaShem Elokeinu, HaShem Echad ("Hear, O Israel, the Lord is God, the Lord is One"), the last word we recite is Echad (One), the last word we hear is the call to the Oneness of God and implicitly the unity of His Creation.

The sad history of man's inhumanity has taken place throughout many centuries of supposed religious supremacy. However, the world is changing, especially in the West.

If the whole purpose and idea of Creation has been perverted throughout human history, in spite of the teaching of the Torah, what will happen now that society is becoming increasingly secular and throwing off the constraints and ideals of religious instruction?

Perhaps we need to understand a shocking truth – that the movement toward a secular society and the abandonment of religion is at least in part the result of religion's historical inability to communicate the basic truth of the human condition as taught in Genesis.

The lesson of Adam is there. It is subtle but accessible. Unity, dignity, integrity, brotherhood of all by all are essential to humanity because they are inherent in God's Creation. Will we ever learn this simple, basic, essential lesson? ■

Paul Socken is distinguished professor emeritus at the University of Waterloo.

100 QUESTIONS ABOUT A WILL CHALLENGE

On June 2nd, 2015, B'nai Brith Canada's Estates & Trusts, Lawyers Division, will be presenting its seminar entitled 100 Questions About a Will Challenge. We will be using a combination of a moot court and panel discussion as an innovative presentation method. Since 2006, B'nai Brith Canada's Estates and Trusts Group has been providing seminars for lawyers and accountants on issues of interest. Our seminars have qualified for CPD hours. The format of the seminar will be a moot trial. The facts are drawn from several actual cases to highlight issues of interest in will challenges. In this hypothetical scenario, an illiterate elderly woman only speaks Russian and Yiddish makes a will. Her unemployed son persuades his mother to transfer her home to him and make a new will that disinherits his sister. At the time the will was made, the mother suffered from Alzheimer's. While under the care of her son, she drove her car into a pole resulting in irreversible brain damage. The Judge of the moot court will be Jordan Atin of Hull & Hull LLP. We will highlight issues including capacity, undue influence, solicitor's negligence and the feasibility of a will challenge while the testator is still alive.Whenever there is an issue of capacity, it is common to have a retrospective capacity assessment done. In our case scenario, Dr. Ken Shulman of the Dept. Of Psychiatry, Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, did a retrospective capacity assessment. Brendon Donovan of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP will conduct the examination in chief and David Lobl of Dentons Canada will do the cross examination. This portion of the seminar has skilled estates litigators using a trial scenario to teach attendees about testamentary capacity, examination in chief and cross examination in an estate context. The event will take place on June 2nd, 2015 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8. Registration is at 7:30am and the moot court will begin at 8:00am. The event is open to lawyers and accountants. Those lawyers and/or accountants interested in attending may contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca. Charles B. Wagner, of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP, is a certified specialist in Estates & Trusts Law. He chairs the Estate and Trusts Group, Lawyers Division of Bnai Brith that created and runs this annual continuing legal education program for professionals dealing with estate and trust issues.

The Silver Platter story

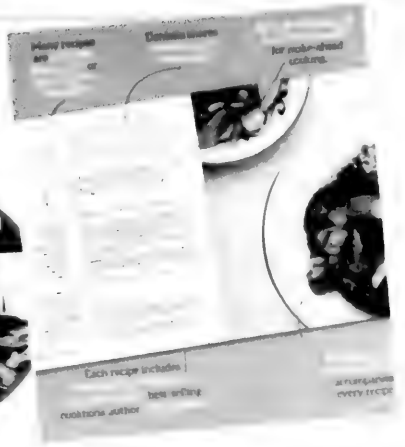
Daniella Silver is a young mom of three. Her family is a long string of artists, and she inherited that inclination.

Ever since she was a little girl, she always found that food was the best outlet for her bursting creativity. "I know that you eat with your eyes first and your mouth second." Her dishes have always used esthetics as an extra-special ingredient.

Four years ago, she found out that two of her daughters had severe food allergies. As a result, she had to rethink her entire culinary repertoire. But that didn't stop her from making beautifully delicious dishes. In fact, it gave her the creative push needed to develop a whole new roster of recipes using healthy ingredients and simple techniques to produce spectacular results.

Soon she had a binder full of hand-written recipes and realized that she wanted to share what she learned with other moms around the world. She wanted to write a book that could be shared from one generation to the next, grandmother to mother to daughter, like the cookbooks that her mother gave to her.

She turned to Norene Gilletz, the kosher culinary guru who had inspired her since childhood. She was familiar with Gilletz's recipes as her mom made them for her when she was a child, and the idea of working with her was an absolute dream.



Daniella Silver and Norene Gilletz

With the kind of passion-fuelled confidence that's born out of fear and nerves, she picked up the phone and gave Norene a call. She just had to share her story, her passion, and her cookbook dream.

Later, Norene told her that her enthusiasm and creativity reminded her of herself when she was a young cook. What really stuck with Norene, though, was Daniella's passion for passing down culinary knowledge throughout generations. Norene understood and shared this vision, and jumped onto the cookbook project without hesitation.

They spent endless days reviewing, editing, and tasting the fruits of their labour.

Two years of hard work and a good many pots of tea later, they're ready to present The Silver Platter: Simple to Spectacular, a wholesome, family-friendly cookbook with over 160 recipes for every occasion and every diet. It's the perfect addition to the bookshelves of aspiring cooks for generations to come. ■

Delmanor offers all-inclusive retirement communities

Seniors looking for an active and all-inclusive retirement community should consider one of Delmanor's five locations in the GTA.

These Tridel-inspired condominiums promise the high quality associated with the developer's name along with amenities and programs aimed specifically at seniors.

"The rental of the suite includes a continental breakfast, lunch and dinner service, weekly house cleaning and access to a health-care professional 24-hours a day," says Nikki Lewis, corporate manager of marketing and sales for Delmanor.

Included in the monthly price is a pendant with an emergency response system that has a built-in GPS so the staff know exactly where a resident is in case of an emergency, and are able to respond immediately.

The buildings are set up with rooftop terraces, shuffleboard courses, libraries, computer cafes and pubs.

It's doubtful seniors will ever be bored with the wide range of daily entertainment and activities offered, such as fitness classes.

Specific space is also set aside for religious services.

"Our community partners come and provide those services. For example, in the North York location, we have a South African Jewish community, so they host a Friday night Shabbat," says Lewis.

Although the menu is not kosher, there's always an alternative available to pork and shellfish products. They also accommodate other dietary requirements, like vegetarian and gluten-free.

One unique feature of the Delmanor groups is their LivingWell program – a coaching service which helps residents set their goals, come up with an action plan to achieve their goals and provides support throughout the process.

"It's a fantastic program," Lewis says. "It encourages [both] individual empowerment and building a sense of community, so we offer group programming and also one-to-one programming."

"Recently in Etobicoke someone wanted to stop using his cane and develop balance. Thanks to the LivingWell program, he's now been able to stop using his cane within the residence. He only uses it within his suite and when he leaves the residence," Lewis says. "That's a huge personal achievement for him."

Resident's can also use the LivingWell coaching program to achieve goals beyond those related to fitness.

"I personally know a lady who lost a family member and she went to our LivingWell coach as a confidante and talked to him about the grieving process, and he helped her find community resources as well."

Delmanor's programs and services seek to take care of the whole person – physically, mentally and socially.

"There's a feeling when you walk into our communities – it's such a warm welcoming feeling. It truly is a family feeling."■

Oy! I'm kvelling!

Living in a one or two bedroom retirement rental suite with full hotel style service changes everything for the better. No more household chores, which means lots of time for Bubbe and Zayde to spend with the Bubellah. They can teach you about computers in the internet lounge, you can teach them to putt on the putting green, or play piano, or all about gardening in the potting room. The list is almost endless and your family is always welcome for Shabbat dinner in our gracious private dining room with table service. Of course, your suite has a kitchenette so you can still say "Ess a bisel eppis, tatelleh". Gib a kick. Discover this grand Tridel inspired lifestyle. Come for a personal tour and nosh, or call to inquire about a free trial stay. Act now to enjoy full hotel style service, including meals and our renowned LivingWell lifelong health and learning programs.

I've got hearing aids! Now what?

TRACY SAUNDERS

Getting hearing aids can feel like the end of a long journey for some. The average person will first suspect a hearing loss and then wait seven years before booking a hearing test. Seven long years of struggling with background noise, laughing at the wrong jokes, asking others to repeat themselves and pretending to hear.

Finally, you have made the decision to have your hearing tested. At that appointment you learn that you do in fact have a hearing loss and order a pair of state-of-the-art hearing aids. Now what?

While getting hearing aids may feel like the end of a journey, it actually marks the start of a new one. Luckily, this new journey is quite simple and easy to follow. Once a person is fitted with hearing aids, their homework is simple. Wear them. Wear them every day and all day long if you can.

Doing this allows your brain to become accustomed to your new, better hearing and you should actually forget you are even wearing anything at all!

We would call this phase of your hearing aid journey, the "maintenance" phase. During this time, we want to maintain your hearing aids and the hearing level you have.

Hearing Solutions offers drop-in cleaning services at all our clinic locations. Regular in-clinic cleanings allow our staff to use specialized equipment to clean debris that can build up in the hearing aids and check whether they are functioning well. No appointment is needed for a cleaning service.

So, when is your next appointment? Once you have gotten your hearing aids, we will assume you are wearing them and enjoying them! In other words, no news is good news.

All patients are encouraged to call and book a service appointment whenever they have any difficulty with their hearing or their hearing aids. If you have purchased your hearing aids from us, your appointments are always free.

Let's say that you love your hearing aids right off the bat. You will always be asked to come for a check-up two to four weeks after getting your new hearing aids. That is a standard policy. It allows us to evaluate your progress and ensure correct use of the hearing aids. After that, like previously mentioned, it is up to you to let us know if you are having difficulties. Otherwise, we won't call you until a year later for your annual checkup.

Congratulations are always in order for a patient who has embarked on the journey towards better hearing health. For some, it can seem like a daunting journey, but it is incredibly worthwhile both for you and those around you.

Most importantly, it is often much easier than anybody would expect. Partnering with a clinic like Hearing Solutions ensures you will be taken care of long after your purchase of hearing aids. While buying the hearing aids is an important step, it is only the start of a long but exciting journey. Trust us with your hearing and, in turn, you will always get sound advice you can trust. ■

Take charge of your aging at Pearl^{MD} Rejuvenation

The new science of aging is shedding light on the coveted fountain of youth. Our midlife represents both risk and opportunity. As we creep into our middle years we often begin to experience disruptive symptoms, notice rapid aging in our skin and changes in our body shape. At the same time we face increased risk of chronic diseases such as diabetes, heart disease and cancer. And so our midlife becomes a critical window of opportunity to take charge of our aging.

Underscoring rapid midlife aging is the accelerated loss of vital factors: our hormones, our nutrients, our sleep and our telomeres, which are protective caps on the ends of our chromosomes that shorten as we age and place a finite limit on our lifespan. Rapid aging ensues: from the age of 40 to 50 years women age twice as fast as any other decade.

The menopausal loss of hormones contributes to the "cliff effect" of accelerated midlife aging in women as compared to men. But hormones are just one piece of the aging puzzle. A comprehensive proactive aging strategy must look to balance hormones while also addressing nutritional and lifestyle factors such as too much stress and not enough sleep.

While genetics and telomeres are critical, new science is revealing that our genes are not set in stone. But rather, our DNA is a road map that can be shaped by our lifestyle and life choices. And so a customized lifestyle plan can help us achieve ageless vitality, optimal health and peak performance now and for our long future.

Maintaining healthy skin, youthful facial contours, and a fit body are cornerstones of a comprehensive inside-outside approach to navigating the aging process. The external signs of aging–deepening wrinkles, sagging skin, jowls and pigmented spots are highly amenable to non-surgical effective technologies and treatments including natural dermal fillers to revolumize, neuromodulators such as Botox to lift and shape the brow, and medical grade skin care to retexture the skin and correct uneven pigment. The combined esthetic approach is vital to achieve natural meaningful results.

There will never be a magic bullet to the fountain of youth. Instead, a comprehensive inside-outside approach can keep us looking good and feeling great through the ages. ■

Arab-Israeli women more traumatized by birth, study shows

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Giving birth is one of the most powerful experiences of a woman's life. Yet until recently, women's feelings about the event weren't given much consideration – despite long lasting and potentially serious consequences that could include post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). In Israel, although Jewish and Arab women give birth side by side, a recent study reveals disturbing inequalities in their perceptions.

According to the study, 32 per cent of Arab mothers reported that they had had a traumatic birth, compared with only 14 per cent of Jewish mothers. Arab mothers said they were more afraid for themselves or their babies, and that they'd received too much medical intervention. The study relied on self-reporting in the absence of any consistent scientific definition of "traumatic birth."

Lead researcher Ofra Halperin, a senior lecturer in the nursing department of Emek Izrael (Yezreel Valley) College, has spent a lifetime studying women's health and began this study, with two other Israeli researchers, out of a deep personal interest.

"We live in Israel," says Halperin. "The two main populations here are Jewish and Arab. I wanted to know if there is a difference, due to culture. Because when you're in the hospital, in the maternity ward... it [seems] like everything is the same, but it's not really the same."

> The outcomes of birth here in Israel are good for mother and child

Although Halperin's study unearthed significant psychological differences, the study found identical low rates of medical problems in mother or baby. "The outcomes of birth here in Israel are good for mother and child. There's no difference between Arab and Jewish women...

In the hospitals, they all get the same treatment, the same facilities, there's no exceptions here."

So why does women's perception matter at all? "If you suffer more, if you see your birth as traumatic, it will have an effect for months afterwards."

The worst-case scenario is PTSD. Though this is a rare outcome, Halperin says "there are certain things that are not acceptable after birth." Her study identified only a very small group with PTSD, but most of those affected were Arab.

Trauma can also cause sleeping disorders, breastfeeding problems and difficulties in establishing a solid bond with the baby. And having had one traumatic birth experience, researchers found, was also a strong predictor for future traumatic experiences.

Jewish and Arab mothers prepare very differently for childbirth, says Halperin.

"Jewish women... are always questioning... they ask their friends, they go to professionals to get more information... Young people want a lot of information. They ask a lot of questions, they want to know more, they want to know all their options. They want to have control, they want to choose."

Arab mothers, on the other hand, "take things as they come. Especially women. They are still not independent enough, confident enough in themselves to take control. That's why they don't go to preparation classes, and they still count on their elders more than on professionals."

The differences are obvious when they come to the hospital. "Jewish women say, 'Why this, why that, why did you decide to do that?' The Arab women... take whatever is offered... They don't say, 'What are my other options?' ... They lean on the professionals with not much questioning.

"We have to be aware of the differences and take them into account when we take care of those women to help them get the best experience that they can have."

When she lectures internationally, Halperin says many people ask her "if [these differences are] because of the political situation here, that they receive less treatment, or different treatment. [But] it's not so."

"Israeli Arabs get the same opportunities and the same treatment as Jewish Israelis. Still, the culture and the background that you come from have an influence... If I asked Ethiopian Jews who gave birth here, I'm sure their experience is different from Israeli-born Jews, because of the culture that they come from."

Recruiting more Arab midwives will help erase cultural barriers and even linguistic ones, since many rural Arab women can't speak Hebrew.

At Halperin's college, in the Galilee, nursing students are about half Jewish and half Arab. "If some of [the Arab students] would like after they are finished studying to go and learn midwifery, I would be happy. I am encouraging a lot of them to come."

Transcending cultural differences means better experiences for all mothers, says Halperin. "Women who have control, especially in something as significant as birth, [find it] very empowering. It doesn't matter who you are and where you're from – you deserve it."■

Living with brain cancer

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Heidi Wilk recalls her husband, Matthew's diagnosis with a brain tumour in 2008 as the saddest moment of her life.

"I thought, 'my husband is going to die young. We are not going to grow old together. Why was this happening?'"

Matthew, 32, had a seizure picking up their then one-year-old daughter, Brooke, from Chabad Day Care on June 27, 2008.

"When he awoke from his seizure, he said, "there was a rabbi looking over me. I thought I was in heaven."

Since then, said Heidi, "we have had a strong connection to Chabad. Matthew has put on tfillin every morning since that day."

After the seizure, a tumour the size of a baseball was discovered, and Matthew had surgery to have it removed.

"Two weeks later, we met with the team at Princess Margaret Hospital, and they told us it was glioblastoma multiforme. Dr. Warren Mason came up with the chemotherapy [treament] that has kept Matthew alive for a very long time," said Heidi.

> "There was a rabbi looking over me. I thought I was in heaven."

Both from Montreal, Heidi and Matthew moved in 2002 to Toronto, where Matthew was doing his residency in medicine. Heidi, a registered dietician at Toronto Rehabilitation Institute, became the family's breadwinner.

As we age, our bodies go through many changes. Many people, over the age of 55, notice that their muscles become not as strong as they used to be. In such cases very often doctors diagnose Sarcopenia, which is in the most literal sense means the loss of muscle mass, strength and function. It happens due to change in hormone levels, alteration in protein requirements and sedentary lifestyle. Symptoms of muscle loss include, but not limited to: musculoskeletal weakness and loss of stamina.

The research done by A.M. Jette and L. Brach, showed that 40% of women aged 55-64, almost 45% of women aged 65-74, and 65% of women aged 75-84 are unable to lift 10lb weight holding their arm straight. Typically by the age of 75 sarcopenia accelerates rapidly and it may contribute to frailty and increases the likelihood of falls and fractures in older adults.

Although scientists keep working on drugs to help treat the sarcopenia, the best known treatment so far which has been medically proven is regular exercising. Specifically resistance training or strength training, exercising that increases muscle strength and endurance, has been shown to help prevent and treat sarcopenia. Resistance training has been reportedly showing a positive influence on the neuromuscular system, hormone concentrations and protein synthesis rate. Research has shown that a consistently progressive program of resistance training can increase protein synthesis in older adults in as little as two weeks. However, exercising routine should be very carefully balanced according to the needs and physical shape to be safe and avoid a risk of injury. For optimal results a fitness specialist should create a plan and oversee the the proper number, intensity, and frequency of resistance exercise.

Chai Lifeline played a big role in the Wilk family life

"We were told he had 18 months – maybe three years – to live, if we were lucky," she said.

Matthew responded well to the chemotherapy and radiation. The family made life adjustments, and went on to have two more children, Zachary, now age four, and Joshua, age two.

Post diagnosis, Matthew continued to complete his medical fellowship at St Michael's hospital and then got hired as staff obstetrician at Mount Sinai Hospital. But then, life threw the family another curve.

After four years, the tumour came back in the same spot. Joshua was then four months old.

Matthew had surgery again and was started on a new treatment called Avastin which had been recently approved in Canada, but not funded for brain cancer.

"The problem with Avastin is that it is extremely expensive and the government does not cover it. However, my insurance does cover it so that's why I have to work full time. It's not an option," said Heidi.

Matthew needs treatment every two weeks.

After the recurrence of the disease in November 2012 his clinical privileges were largely restricted to that of a surgical assistant.

Keeping busy was Heidi's therapy.

"I didn't have time to sit and think about everything that was going on. The stress most working moms experience on a daily basis increased 10-fold for me. My work-life balance also included surgeries, hospital visits, chemotherapy, radiation treatments and juggling insurance claims to cover Matthew's expensive medications.

Chai Lifeline played a big role in the Wilk family life.

"Matthew would come home tired from his treatments. I would come home from work with three young kids running around. Everything was put on me. Chai Lifeline helped me by picking up the kids and taking them to programs. Big Sisters would come take the kids out, and they provided us with counselling services," says Heidi.

Every three months, Matthew has an MRI. "Before he gets his MRI results he meets with the rabbi because it gives him comfort and hope.

"Between visits, life is normal but around the MRI time it all comes back," she said."

For five years I didn't say a word. People didn't know what was going on and then I just said I am ready. After the recurrence I was so full of emotion I had to let it out. I had so much to say.

"Matthew is teaching the kids how to ride bikes, and he plays with them every moment he can. He gets around the city by TTC, he bikes, and every Saturday takes the kids to Chabad service.

"Matthew has unfaltering appreciation and compassion for everything I accomplish in a day. We are best friends. We love each other. We laugh. We don't need much to be happy together. We appreciate life's little things and don't lose sight of what's important.

"I hate cancer but I love how it's changed me. I now appreciate what I have more than I long for what I don't. I hope to teach my kids these important life lessons so they can grow up to cherish what they have and live every day to the fullest," says Heidi. ■

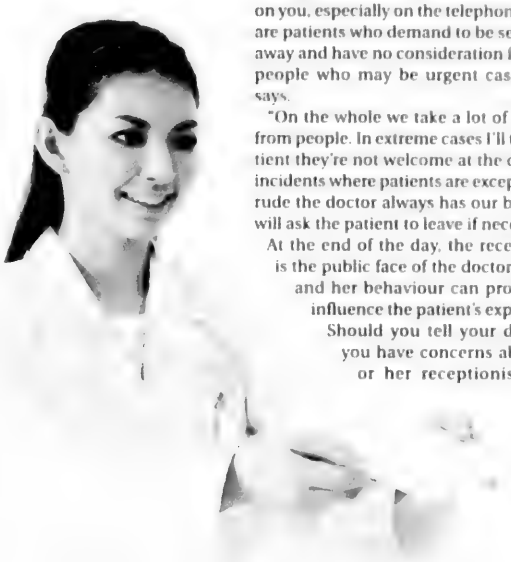
The Medical Receptionist: Make sure she's on your side

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



She's the person who stands between you and the doctor you need to see: the physician's receptionist or personal assistant. Her job is thankless and prestige-free.

The doctor gets all the credit for whatever happens inside the closed door of the consulting room. The receptionist presides over the waiting room, juggling the doctor's overwhelming caseload, managing difficult patients and setting up tests and referrals. She is lucky if she gets a smile, let alone a word of thanks.

More likely, she'll get complaints about the wait time or angry words about mistakes in scheduling.

Many of us consider receptionists mere paper-pushers, but the truth is they are in command when it comes to seeing a doctor. The control they wield is absolute, and delays at their discretion can be excruciating. It pays to have them on your side.

Lisa Hallgren is the medical receptionist at a Richmond, B.C. walk-in clinic, and says her biggest gripe is the disrespect she receives from some patients.

"People will take their frustrations out on you, especially on the telephone. There are patients who demand to be seen right away and have no consideration for other people who may be urgent cases," she says.

"On the whole we take a lot of attitude from people. In extreme cases I'll tell a patient they're not welcome at the clinic. In incidents where patients are exceptionally rude the doctor always has our back and will ask the patient to leave if necessary."

At the end of the day, the receptionist is the public face of the doctor's office, and her behaviour can profoundly influence the patient's experience. Should you tell your doctor if you have concerns about his or her receptionist? Definitely, says Dr. Stanley Hurwitz, a Richmond, B.C. family physician. "If there is a significant issue in the front room and I don't know about it, I can't do anything about it," he says. "Sure, I'm going to be protective of my staff. But I expect my staff to be courteous with my patients and vice-versa."

How not to annoy the receptionist:

"How much longer?" Don't persistently question the receptionist on the estimated waiting time until you will be seen.

"I'm a friend (colleague) of the doctor's. Can you get me in today?" Never take advantage of a personal or professional relationship with a doctor to try and get an appointment sooner than would otherwise be available.

"The doctor has to cancel." Don't be upset. Understand that medical or family emergencies are inevitable and often they incur delays and rescheduling of appointments.

"I don't have an appointment, but..." Don't arrive unannounced – unless, of course, the situation is an emergency.

"I'm calling for my test results." Don't keep phoning for results that can't be delivered over the phone. ■

Strategies to improve kids nutrition

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When mealtimes are more about tantrums, screaming and bribery than healthy eating, a mother may feel at the end of her tether.

Aviva Allen, a children's nutritionist, spoke to some 40 mothers last fall as part of a parenting speaker series at Adath Israel Congregation.

Inspired by her two young boys and their adventures in food, Allen understands the challenges faced by parents, and she specializes in helping them with their nutritional needs. Prenatal nutrition, the introduction of solid foods, dealing with picky eaters, food sensitivities, digestive issues, healthy weight, and all areas of nutrition relating to kids and families are dealt with by Allen through her nutritional counselling practice located in mid-town Toronto.

After obtaining certification from the Canadian School of Natural Nutrition, Allen went on to graduate from the Natural Gourmet Institute for Health and Culinary Arts in New York City, a health supportive chef training program with an emphasis on cooking with whole, unprocessed foods. Additionally, she has received specialty pediatric training in the SOS Approach to Feeding for children who are picky and/or resistant eaters.

Allen conveyed to the group of mothers proven strategies to help children and their families embrace better eating habits.

"Picky eating is something that many children will go through. The key is knowing when there is a problem, when it is appropriate to take action, and how."

She offered the following tips:

• Eat with your kids: "Have at least one meal a day together, as each meal is a learning opportunity, an opportunity for the child to learn from your skills. Kids are learning what and how you are eating. If you want your kids to eat vegetables you also need to be eating vegetables. Eating on the go, grazing, eating in the car or standing up, skipping meals – these are learned behaviours. You have to watch what you are doing," she said.

Aviva Allen with sons Solomon and Lev

• You want to make certain your child's meals are not too close together but also not too far apart:

"Offer four to five opportunities to eat throughout the day, including meals and snacks. Snacks don't have to be snacking foods. They can be small meals. Leave two to three hours between meals and snacks. If they are too close together, they can cause issues because the child is not hungry enough to eat."

• Don't force food: "For example, a parent or grandparent chasing the child around the room with a spoon. Pressure can be seen in different forms."

Allen said that if they are eating in a family setting, there will be less pressure on the child.

"And don't be a short-order cook. Focus on serving one common meal but make some variation on it" she said.

Some parents will offer bribery in terms of sweets and desserts, but that does not send the right message.

"If it is a non-food reward, it can be effective for some children. My children might pick a sleepover at their grandparents or a trip to the science centre. This is all about encouraging them to try new foods," said Allen.

Children will not starve themselves, true or false? "Most healthy children will not starve themselves. However, there is a small percentage of the pediatric population – maybe three to five per cent – that actually would starve themselves. There may be some sensory issues involved.

• Have fun with your food: "Kids love to play with their food and I encourage them to do this. It is a way for them to explore and learn, and helps them to become more comfortable with new foods before putting them into their mouths."

Many parents try sneaking vegetables into foods. "Parents who do this feel better. They feel they are doing their job, and getting nutrients into their child. Nevertheless, you still need to teach children those skills, teach them to actually enjoy eating whole fruits and vegetables," said Allen.

"I think your goal as a parent is to try and teach your child healthy eating habits that will last him until adulthood. It is not just about how much he is eating at this particular meal, or this week, or this month – it's about building healthy eating habits, and that will take time." ■

Four Elms top choice for seniors

Four Elms Retirement Residence, which opened four years ago in Thornhill, offers care for both independent seniors and those who require assistance.

"People come in and they can be completely independent and as they continue to age and their needs change, they don't have to move out," says Reesa Soto, Four Elms marketing manager. "We can provide assisted-living services within the building and in the privacy within their own suite."

Four Elms may also be a top choice for seniors who have cognitive impairments. The residence has an entire floor devoted to people with memory issues. The floor is secure, so residents can walk around and feel comfortable.

"The people there are really receiving excellent care," Soto says.

Those with Alzheimer's disease and dementia cannot exit the floors on their own for safety reasons, but family and friends are always welcome to visit and escort them off the floor. Staff also take residents off the floor at least once a day, for all big events and to enjoy the weather.

"It's kind of like a home within a home. It has its own activity room, dining room, lounge, nurses station, yet the feeling is not that of an institutional environment," Soto says. "It's comfortable and it's warm."

The floor also offers the innovative Brain Gym program, exclusive to Four Elms, which focuses on the plasticity of the brain with the aim to slow down or reduce neuro-degenerative diseases.

Residents of all floors receive amenities which include three meals a day, health monitoring, a wireless emergency pendant with built-in GPS, weekly housekeeping, and laundry of linens and towels. Those in assisted living may also get their personal laundry done and assistance with bathing, dressing and administration of medications.

The residence is predominately Jewish, so there is a pre-Shabbat service every Friday afternoon and a rabbi comes in to lead a service. The menu always has a fish alternative or the option to order a la carte. They also accommodate dietary restrictions.

"We are very big on our food and making our residents happy. They have a huge input in everything that goes on here," Soto says. "We take the information they give us and we use it to better ourselves."

Residents are unlikely to be bored with the programs that go on seven days a week. Four Elms has a full-time activity manager who schedules daily exercise classes, lectures, live entertainment and outings.

"We keep the residents stimulated and engaged all the time. There is always something to do here," Soto says. "A lot of the residents say this is a cruise ship that doesn't float."

Soto says children of residents have noticed a huge change in their parents once they've moved into Four Elms. Whereas before they may have felt lonely in their house, they are now interacting with their peers all day long, and it's enhancing their lifestyle.

"It opens a new chapter in their life. Now they have a new purpose to get up and go down and interact, and suddenly their children see them happier and like a different person," Soto says. "They flourish." ■

A lunar Bible, and Al Jazeera accused of anti-Semitism

One small step for... Torah?

A French-Israeli entrepreneur wants to send a Torah to the moon. Haim Aouizerate has launched a campaign to raise $6 million (US) and celebrate the Bible's "innumerable contributions to morality, justice, education, culture, arts and sciences" and "refocus society on the core values it contains." For $18 each, you can buy letters in the scroll, which will be launched in a protective capsule on one of the winner's of the Google Lunar XPRIZE, which challenged 18 teams to land an unmanned rocket on the moon by the end of 2016. The for-profit venture promises to donate hundreds of thousands of dollars to Jewish non-profits worldwide.

Fired employee sues news channel

A fired Al Jazeera America employee is suing the news channel alleging a hostile work environment that included "discriminatory, anti-Semitic and anti-American remarks."

Hilary Swank will play Deborah Lipstadt.

In a lawsuit filed April 28, Matthew Luke said he was fired in February, 10 days after complaining about his supervisor, Osman Mahmud. Luke was Al Jazeera America's head of media and archive management starting in May 2013, before the channel's formal launch. He's seeking $15 million (US) in damages. The suit accuses Mahmud of making anti-Semitic remarks such as "whoever supports Israel should die a fiery death in hell." It also says he replaced female employees with men and filled jobs with men of Middle Eastern descent. Al Jazeera wouldn't comment on the lawsuit.

Movie to depict Lipstadt-Irving battle

Oscar-winning actress Hilary Swank will star as historian Deborah Lipstadt in a film adaptation of her book on her legal battle with a Holocaust denier. The movie will be a courtroom drama based on 2005's History on Trial: My Day in Court with a Holocaust Denier. Tom Wilkinson, a two-time Oscar nominee, will play David Irving, a British revisionist historian who sued Lipstadt for libel after she called him a Holocaust denier in her 1993 book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth & Memory. She won the case in 2000. British playwright David Hare adapted the book for the film. ■

Diaspora connections

The debate between Rabbi Daniel Korobkin and Rabbi Lisa Grushcow over Diaspora criticism of Israel ("Diaspora disconnect?" April 23) is really a debate between those who want to help Israel and those who don't seem to mind if they cause it some harm.

Is there any other diaspora community that persistently organizes campaigns outside its homeland against its policies? Do Canadian expats living in the United States organize groups like J Street to expose the shameful living conditions on native reserves here? Have French expats formed a "Rue F" to protest French "apartheid" in the Muslim banlieues of Paris?

There is no shortage of non-Jewish critics of Israel in Europe and North America. What Israel needs from the Diaspora is vocal support to counter demonization. It is curious that Israel's Diaspora critics place so little trust in Israel's democratic institutions. Like Canada, the country has internal safeguards against human rights abuses. With Israel's liberal Supreme Court, Basic Law and strong human rights lobby, why do so many Diaspora Jews think the country needs external scrutineers?

Marjorie Gann
Toronto

Diaspora connections II

For many years, the issue of whether Jewish leaders are contributing to increased antipathy towards Israel by publicly discussing its flaws has been a challenge for liberal Jews. ("Diaspora disconnect," April 23.)

But some day, hard as it is to imagine at this time, a future government of Israel of a different bent may make decisions that people on the right will find very hard to swallow. A future Israeli government may decide to dismantle West Bank settlements, for example, to allow a Palestinian state to come into existence. A future government may decide on policies that some will perceive as diluting the Jewish character of Israel in the name of enhancing its democratic character.

When and if these developments occur, then it is the Diaspora leaders who are more conservative who will have to decide whether they should refrain from criticizing Israel so as not to cause disconnect or antipathy in their communities, or whether they need to advocate loudly for the principles they believe in, relying on their community members' ability to understand that one can criticize and love at the same time.

Jews in jail

The article on Jews in jail (April 9) went to great lengths to describe the dedication of the rabbis who spend time, effort and expense to bring Judaism to Jewish prisoners.

Unfortunately, the article did not give any information, save but one murder, about the crimes committed by the prisoners. Neither was there any mention of the victims. May I assume (and hope) that these well-intentioned rabbis spend some of their time visiting and perhaps assisting the victims?

Isaac Sachs
Montreal

Jews in jail II

It was a shock and surprise to see the front page's headline was "Jews in jail" (April 9). It would have been enough to put the story in the index. I see the local newspapers always publish negative stories about Jews and Israel on front pages and good reports elsewhere, if at all.

Some of The CJN's articles are painful to read, but it is important to know what is happening worldwide to our people. It would be pleasant to read something that brings a smile to our lips.

Harriet Morton
Toronto

Eshet Chayil

I am sorry Lauren Kramer has problems with Eshet Chayil (April 9). It's written in magnificent poetic biblical Hebrew, and I have never seen an English translation that does it justice. One has to study it closely to reveal its beauty in order to understand it.

To me it is no allegory. In it I see the Jewish women I know: my late mother, my wife, my daughters-in-law and my granddaughters, who are selflessly devoted to family, yet still accomplished in the world.

RABBI·2·RABBI

God is waiting for us on the Omer

As we count the days toward our reunion with the Divine on Shavuot, we learn how to receive every moment as a gift and make each one meaningful

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: The Omer was a sacrifice once offered in the Temple in Jerusalem on the second day of Pesach. It was a single measure of barley that began a 49-day count leading up to the holiday of Shavuot.

On the 50th day of the Omer, another bread offering was given. This time, it was two loaves of wheat. What began as a coarse sacrifice became 50 days later a more refined gift.

During these days, with no Temple to offer such sacrifices, we now count each day toward day 50 and offer a verbal blessing. What does the Omer count mean to you?

Rabbi Splansky: I couldn't tell the difference between a sheaf of barley and a sheaf of wheat, but sfirat haOmer has become an important part of how I mark Jewish time.

I love that we count up from the sea to Sinai. The message is that Pesach and its newfound freedom is not the pinnacle of our sacred narrative – Sinai is. Our freedom was euphoric, but incomplete until we received the Torah and its promise of meaningful purpose. This gets at the core of Judaism's strivings.

Rabbi Fishman: There is a technical detail of Halachah whereby if a person forgets to count the Omer for an entire day, then they have forfeited the opportunity to say the blessings on the subsequent days of the count.

Seen in a vacuum, this law appears to be nitpicking or just irrelevant minutia. However, understanding that we are building up to a conclusion that celebrates each and every step taken along the way, we realize that Judaism values the journey just as much as the destination.

Rabbi Splansky: Maimonides likens the counting of the Omer to a person who expects his most beloved friend to arrive on a certain day. He counts up the days, and even the hours, until his arrival.

I delight in this metaphor that God is waiting in anticipation for the Jewish People to come for a reunion each year on Shavuot.

Rabbi Fishman: You touch on something very powerful: God waiting for us. This is a theology that is not often spoken about and taught to us as children. As such, when we grow up, there can be a tendency to view God through the narrow vision of our childhood.

We were taught that God is all-knowing, ever-present and all-powerful. While these propositions are philosophical axioms, they miss the drama of who God really is.

God is someone waiting by the phone. God is the lover constantly checking his watch, waiting for the moment when his beloved will return. In some ways God, too, counts each day, waiting for our reunion.

Rabbi Splansky: We count time, not people.

Jewish custom and superstition warn against counting souls. For example, one might not tell you how many grandchildren she has. The minyan may be established by counting: "Not one, not two..." or by reciting a ten-worded verse of prayer, assigning one word per person.

But our days are numbered. We Jews are bound to our sacred calendar. Why the obsession with marking time? As the Psalmist beseeches God: "Teach us to number our days that we may attain a heart of wisdom."

The counting of the Omer is an exercise in awareness: to receive each day as a gift and to be mindful of how to make every day count. As Psalm 90 says: "May the work of our hands endure." ■

UNDUE INFLUENCE AND THE WILL CHALLENGE

As regular readers of this column undoubtedly know, there is a seminar set for June 2nd, 2015. For the purpose of this column, I want to focus on one aspect of the seminar being organized by B'nai Brith Canada's Estates & Trusts, Lawyers Division that deals with undue influence. Since 2006, B'nai Brith Canada has been providing seminars to lawyers and accountants on issues of interest. In the context of a will challenge, it is very prevalent that one side will allege that undue influence was exerted on the testator in the making of a will which invalidates the testamentary document. In our case scenario, the allegation by the daughter is that her brother unduly influenced their mother to make a will that disinherited the sister. Ordinarily, the sister would have the onus to prove undue influence unless there are suspicious circumstances that reverses the onus. In our case, arguably suspicious circumstance exists because the mother had Alzheimer's at the time that she signed the will, she was illiterate and her lawyer took only 10 minutes to translate and explain a complicated will. It is therefore debatable that the onus has shifted and it is up to the brother to prove that there was no undue influence. In order to highlight these issues and the test to prove undue influence, a portion of the moot court will include an examination of the brother (played by John Clegg of Scotia Private Client Group) by Debra Stephens of Goddard Gamage Stephens. Kimberly Whaley of Whaley Litigation will be cross examining the witness.

Ethiopian Jews deserve better

As Israel's emergency delegation to Nepal prepared to leave Kathmandu over the weekend, the death toll from a massive earthquake was still mounting. The members of the 260-strong team surely had mixed feelings about going home, having witnessed such devastating human tragedy, but also knowing they had saved lives and represented Israel, and all Jews, with courage and honour.

There are no shortage of stories about the heroic efforts of Israeli medical and rescue personnel deployed in Nepal, and a number of pro-Israel groups have ensured these acts of bravery were well-dispersed, especially on social media. But the truth is Israel's Nepal mission wasn't about chasing good PR. It ran much deeper.

The speed with which Israel offered and deployed assistance and expertise came from a natural impulse to ease the pain of the afflicted. And the extraordinary operation to find Or Asraf, the last remaining Israeli unaccounted for in Nepal, proved just how far Israel will go to retrieve its own, even if the 22-year-old ultimately could not be saved. All told, Israel's mission in Nepal exemplified the Jewish nation's genuine desire to lend a hand when disaster strikes, and propensity to punch above its weight when it comes to helping those who need it, wherever they may be.

And yet, back in Israel those very qualities were being called into question by the country's Ethiopian Jewish community after a video was released apparently showing two Israeli policemen attacking Damas Pakada. Pakada, 21, an Ethiopian immigrant who came to Israel seven years ago and was wearing his Israel Defence Forces uniform at the time of the incident, was pushed from his bicycle and then thrown to the ground. He was handcuffed and arrested for assault, but later released from custody.

The troubling episode echoes another recent incident of alleged police brutality against an Ethiopian Jew. Walla Bayach claims Israeli immigration inspectors restrained him last week, believing the Be'er Sheva resident was an illegal migrant. Police say Bayach assaulted the officers when they inquired about his identity. He says they beat him with a crowbar.

Thousands of Ethiopian Jews have taken to the streets in the wake of these incidents. Some have clashed with police. Their protest reveals the deep anger and frustration that have been brewing in Israel's Ethiopian community for years. More than half of the families in the community, which now numbers 135,000, live below the poverty line. The unemployment rate is higher among Ethiopian Jews than Israel's national average, and they are disproportionately represented in the prison system. Many feel Israel has forgotten them. Others say they have effectively been rendered second-class citizens. Some accuse Israel of racism.

That's a hefty charge, one that Israeli authorities should investigate thoroughly. As the United States revisits the state of its race relations after the deaths of Trayvon Martin, Freddie Gray and Michael Brown, perhaps it's time for Israel to do the same. The very same instinct that compelled Israel to send its largest-ever field hospital to Kathmandu, the very same courage that Or Asraf's army buddies displayed while attempting to locate him in the Himalayas – those honourable qualities must be pursued with vigilance at home, too. ■ — YONI

HISTORY

Jewish education is not just a modern-day concern

Editor's Note: The following is an edited version of an essay that first appeared in the May 1951 edition of the Jewish Standard.

Alexander Brown

A time-honoured tradition is regaining wide and renewed acceptance in contemporary North American Jewish life. It is the belief, long cherished by many generations of our people, that Jewish education, while it is a first obligation on all Jewish parents, is likewise the responsibility of the whole Jewish community. This is clearly evident from the continually increasing extent to which federations and welfare funds in the United States and Canada are supporting the cause of Jewish education.

More Jewish leaders are convinced that the only way to ensure a continued lease on life for the Jewish community is adequate Jewish education. Unless our people are educated to vigorous and intelligent Jewishness, it is extremely doubtful whether even the strong external stimulus provided by the rise of the State of Israel can prevent the stagnation and impoverishment of the Jewish spirit in North America. The alternative to a sound Jewish education seems to be the eventual disintegration and submerging of the Jewish community.

In 1936, welfare funds in the United States and Canada subsidized Jewish education to the extent of $750,000. By 1950, some 60 welfare funds and federations had increased this sum to over $2 million, while an appraisal by experts of the overall income from all sources, set the present annual outlay on Jewish education in the two countries at $25 million.

The close connection between the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto and Jewish education in our community goes back almost to the very inception of the welfare fund. One of the first agencies to come into the welfare fund was the Toronto Hebrew Free School, which in 1938, received a grant of $15,000. In 1939, the Eitz-Chaim Talmud Torah, the Borochov School, the Euclid Ave. Talmud Torah, the J.N.W.A (Arbeiter Verband) schools, and the Workmen's Circle School became affiliated with the welfare fund. That year, the total for Jewish education allocated by the Welfare Fund was $29,041. This sum contrasts with a total of $195,937 assigned by the welfare fund to Jewish education in 1950.

In 1943, the Canadian Jewish Congress joined with the welfare fund in sponsoring a survey of Jewish education in Toronto. This action resulted in 1949 in the formation of the Bureau of Jewish Education under its present director, Dr. Joseph Diamond.

The bureau has direct representation on the welfare fund board, as well as the welfare fund executive committee. Samuel Posluns, president of the bureau, is a member of the budget committee of the welfare fund. The Bureau of Jewish Education serves as the Jewish educational arm of the Jewish community of Toronto and has a great many achievements to its credit.

There has been a noticeable change in the prevailing public opinion on Jewish education. There is greater understanding, where before there was ignorance or indifference. There is more goodwill, where before there was hostility.

The bureau began by setting up a staff council, consisting of all school principals and three representatives from the Teachers' Alliance. The council meets frequently on matters pertaining to school management. One of its first decisions was to adopt a uniform system of school management and administration.

All of the schools affiliated with the bureau enjoy ideological and administrative autonomy. Nonetheless, they have agreed to put into effect uniform records of enrolment, attendance, pupil achievement and financial experience. All schools make periodic reports to the bureau.

> "Jewish education, while it is a first obligation on all Jewish parents, is likewise the responsibility of the whole Jewish community

The board of directors consists of representatives of all affiliated schools and representatives elected by the community at large, including four representatives each from the Welfare Fund and the Canadian Jewish Congress. Eight standing committees have been organized to deal with budgets, personnel, youth and adult education, public relations, publications, etc.

The bureau has successfully merged the three existing Yiddish high schools of the Borochov, J.N.W.A. and Workmen's Circle in a single high school (Mittel-Shule).

A comprehensive plan has been worked out for the classification of all teachers in four categories on the basis of academic training, experience and pedagogic attainment.

The bureau has arranged a number of useful lectures and seminars for the Jewish teachers in Toronto, in order to enable them to grow professionally.

Among the services to the community initiated by the bureau is the Youth Institute of Jewish Studies. The institute, especially intended for people of college age, has functioned at Oakwood Collegiate during the past term, and has proved extremely popular. Classes have been offered in Hebrew, Yiddish, Jewish history, current Jewish problems, Jewish personalities, etc. The bureau intends to establish a similar institute of Jewish studies for adults, in co-operation with the University of Toronto.

There is a wide field of activities open to our Central Agency for Jewish Education. These range from co-ordinating the work of the various school-units in the community and bringing them to a higher efficiency, to offering them a great variety of technical as well as financial aid. The bureau will provide greater supervision, curricular guidance and materials, text books, audio-visual aids and specialized services in extra-curricular and inter-school activities.

In line with enlightened thinking on this subject by many lay leaders, nationally and locally, Arthur Gelber, president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto, made a forthright statement at his inaugural meeting, in which he declared his intention to do everything in his power to strengthen the position of Jewish education in our community.

It is to be fervently hoped that Toronto Jewry will rally wholeheartedly to Mr. Gelber's call and will, in the current campaign, provide the welfare fund with the means to make possible adequate and generous support for the most vital need of all – that of educating our children, our young people and our adults in a living, intelligent, sustaining Judaism. ■

Alexander Brown (1909-1984) was a leader in the field of Jewish education in Toronto. He held various positions with Toronto's Board of Jewish Education and the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, and was actively involved with other Jewish organizations, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress and the United Jewish Welfare Fund.

Is there a future for intermarried rabbis?

Three Canadian Reconstructionist leaders consider whether their denomination should ordain rabbinical students married to non-Jews

RABBI ELIZABETH BOLTON

In 1989, when I began attending the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC), there was no guarantee that I would ever find congregational work or rabbinic employment of any kind in the mainstream Jewish community. Why? Because of the person I loved.

There are many who will argue – correctly – that the analogy between the issue of rabbis partnering with members of other religious backgrounds and the changes that have unfolded in synagogue life regarding sexual orientation and sexual expression among clergy is an imperfect one. Yet a heightened sensitivity around both issues is unfolding amid tremendous changes in the North American Jewish communal landscape.

No one can dispute that we are in the midst of a huge paradigm shift. Many reports – articulate, persuasive, fluent with the research – have crossed our screens and news feeds since that big calendar change 15 years ago. Buzz words – remember continuity? – have come and gone. Yet pervasive hand-wringing persists. Will our people survive? Will we make and bring up enough Jewish babies who will then make and bring up Jewish babies? This, I believe, is at the core of the deep fear that pervades Jewish life in the 21st century.

Contrary to recent headlines, the RRC does not have a "ban" on "interfaith" or intermarried rabbis or rabbinical students. A January 2015 article in the New Republic was headed by the puzzling "Is American Judaism Ready for Interfaith Rabbis?" and a recent JTA report, titled "Reconstructionists Consider Dropping Ban on Intermarried Rabbis," was widely picked up by the Anglo-Jewish press.

The current policy reads: "The RRC does not ordinarily admit or graduate as a rabbi a student married to, or in a committed relationship with, a non-Jew." While not necessarily relevant to the vast majority of applicants, this sentence has sparked fierce and sometimes painful conversations in the college community. Many lives were adversely affected. The college faculty discerned a need to revisit the policy, did so, and is still in the midst of its discernment, while having passed a preliminary vote in favour of altering the policy. (Those alarmed by the headlines may rest assured that even if the change passes a final vote, no "interfaith rabbis" will be ordained by the RRC.)

> "What is important is that Jewish families and Jewish communities continue to welcome and support Jewish people"

Like all of the decisions Reconstructionist leaders strive to reach, the college employed a values-based decision-making process. I was trained, and indeed was compelled only by this rabbinical training seminary, to bring Judaism's treasure trove of textual wisdom to lived lives of Jewish people while integrating contemporary mores.

Peoples change, and leaders lead. Inclusivity and diversity, newer buzzwords, are not proffered as replacements for standards or boundaries. Rather, what is happening in Jewish homes and hearts reflects the ever-evolving life-scape of our people. Of the dozen or so couples with whom I have met in Ottawa over the past year and a half, one looked like a "traditional" pair – young, endogamous, opposite sex – and in that couple, one partner converted! To them, and to all of my couples, I convey my firm belief that they are the face of the Jewish community, that they are inside not outside needing to be included, not different because their race or ethnicity is marked as non-normative by unspoken assumption – our community, and I celebrate their presence.

Others may address the questions of whether or not rabbis should be held to a different standard; whether inter-partnering is detrimental to the Jewish People, and therefore should de facto be outside the range of permissibility for a rabbi; and whether this will further "mark" our movement as extreme, and hamper the credibility of our rabbis, cantors, congregations or initiatives. My colleague, Rabbi Julie Greenberg, writing about the sacredness of family with a "parenting partner" who was not her spouse, wisely once said: "All partnered people engage in a cross-cultural endeavour."

When we conclude the annual cycle of Torah reading we read this phrase, which is also quoted in the well-known liturgical prayer, Yigdal: "Lo kam bevisrael keMoshe od." In Israel, none arose as prophet like Moses. I thought of this phrase when I came across this response in the comment thread to the New Republic article: "The reality is that 'intermarriage' is simply an opportunity to expand… to a new person through marriage… Moses married a non-Jew and brought her into the fold."

Rabbi Joy Levitt and Steve M. Cohen put these cards on the table in a perceptive and timely JTA article last month: "Jews today are facing an unprecedented opportunity to share our rich tradition with thousands who are searching for meaning and looking to raise healthy and happy children with a deep connection to community." I share their optimism and add my hopefulness for the possibility of welcoming all of my passionate, Jewishly committed, creative colleagues who will graduate from the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College of the future. ■

Why is the Green Line not on our schools' maps?

Mira Sucharov

I always enjoy seeing my kids bring home assignments from Hebrew school, and last week was no exception. On a map of Israel were labelled five major cities whose names the students had to write in Hebrew. I delighted in reminding my son that we have relatives or friends in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa, and near Be'er Sheva. There was only one problem with the map, I noticed. There was no Green Line. So to the untrained eye, it looked like Israel's borders span from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River.

As I often do when I want to tease out a political conundrum, I took to social media. On my public Facebook page, I offered to donate $36 to charity for the first person who could show me a Green-Line-indicated map of Israel currently being used in any Jewish educational setting.

Laurie MacDonald Brumberg wrote that a Washington, D.C., Jewish day school has a National Geographic map containing the Green Line hanging in the classroom. Karin Klein of Chicago showed me a Green Line map she said was used at a Schechter day school. And from Gabriel T. Erbs I learned that J Street U has launched an initiative to circulate Green Line maps to educational institutions. David A.M. Wilensky, writing recently in JewSchool, reported that Union for Reform Judaism president Rabbi Rick Jacobs has agreed to champion this among URJ camps and Hebrew schools. Gila Miriam Chait added that Yachad, a pro-Israel, pro-peace group in the United Kingdom, is following suit.

We all know that Middle East maps are heavily invested with the symbolism of legitimacy and delegitimation. The Palestinians have long been accused of erasing Israel from their school maps of Palestine. It's ironic that we are doing the same thing we accuse our adversaries of doing.

But some might argue that since the Green Line is an armistice line, not a border, there is no need for Israel to include it. It's true that it is not a border, but neither does Israel's international territory extend eastward from Jerusalem all the way to the Jordan River. The point is, the West Bank is under occupation – whether one sees the occupation as justified or not – and maps should reflect this geopolitical reality.

What might a more politically informed Israel curriculum entail? From my kids, I have heard about the ingenious ways that Israel foiled the Egyptian invasion of 1948, including placing stones in irrigation pipes to create noise simulating artillery. My eight-year old was impressed.

What I remain less certain about is how much complexity about Israel's future our kids' schools are willing to impart. Will kids learn who the "Palestinians" are? I know that I am guilty of frequently muttering to them about "Israel and the Palestinians" without proper context. While narratives of inter-state war can be much simpler to impart, when it comes to the Palestinian civilian aspect of Israel's founding, and the current military occupation over millions of Palestinians, it's difficult to know where to begin.

When we learn about the past, it's equally important to consider the future. In fact, no one knows more about the importance of historical memory in shaping today's collective political outlook than the Jewish community. As Wilensky writes in the context of the maps, "it's unpleasant for many to hear, but the final status of a two-state solution – if such a thing can ever be achieved – is going to rely heavily on the Green Line. Putting visual depictions of that reality before the eyes of American Jewry will go a long way toward showing them the somewhat unpleasant truths that will help build a more absolutely pleasant future."

As for the J Street U's map initiative, given that Rabbi Jacobs has pledged to roll them out at Reform schools, I hope he will make our communities in Canada an early stop. ■

A shameful moral silence on Iran

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Some time before the March 31 deadline for a framework agreement between Iran and the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany (P5+1) was to expire, Mohammad Reza Naghdi, the head of Iran's religious-based Basij militia of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, declared: "The destruction of Israel is non-negotiable" (my emphasis). This defiantly savage proclamation was quickly reported. The Times of Israel carried the story on deadline day, March 31.

Once these explicit words of official Iranian policy were uttered, one would have thought that the P5+1 team, and especially the American secretary of state, John Kerry, the team's head negotiator and its main spokesperson, would have demanded an official explanation of the statement from the Iranian chief negotiator, Mohammad Javad Zarif. One would have expected that Kerry would unambiguously condemn the Iranian call for the genocide of the people of Israel as an offence to humanity and conscience. One would have expected that he would denounce the Basij leader's statement as inherently counter to the very negotiations at hand. One would have expected that he would at least have called a timeout from the proceedings – if not an actual halt – in order to demonstrate the team's utter revulsion with Iran's murderous foreign policy objectives.

But there was no such reaction by the secretary of state. Indeed, there was no reaction. Period. Perhaps he shook his head in disapproval, but there is no record even of this. "Just more bluster from the persistent but basically misunderstood Iranians," Kerry may have thought. "Nothing too serious. Anyway, we have heard it before. No sense risking offending Zarif and his boss Ayatollah Khamenei. They might walk away from the negotiations!" Kerry probably said to himself. Or words to that effect.

There is no suggestion, alas, that American conscience was rattled or offended that day by Iran's reaffirmation that it intends to wipe Israel off the map. Even days later there is no evidence that American sensibilities were distressed by the Iranian pronouncement. Kerry has remained silent on the matter. U.S. President Barack Obama said it would be a "misjudgment" to demand of Iran, as the Israeli prime minister suggested, that the Shia Muslim theocracy acknowledge the legitimacy of a sovereign Jewish Israel.

Three days after the Basij commander's statement was reported, acting U.S. State Department spokesperson Marie Harf was asked about it. Specifically, she was asked whether such disturbing Iranian pronouncements should be raised in the negotiations over the nuclear agreement. "No," she replied. "This is an agreement that doesn't deal with any other issues, nor should it."

The American response is shocking, as well as morally pernicious.

The fact that Iran's nuclear aspirations are not tied to its foreign policy objectives is the deep structural flaw in the U.S. administration's approach to its negotiations with Iran. It is simply, as Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu characterized, "unconscionable."

In an article published in the Washington Post last month, Jewish Agency head Natan Sharansky perceptively wrote, the "United States appears to have lost the courage of its convictions. We have yet to see the full consequences of this moral diffidence, but one thing is clear: the loss of America's self-assured global leadership threatens not only the United States and Israel, but also the people of Iran and a growing number of others living under Tehran's increasingly emboldened rule."

In his commentary on Parshat Shmini, Rabbi Marc Angel wrote about human responsibility when confronting evil: "In the face of contemporary evil, silence is morally repugnant. One must scream out, one must protest, one must demand justice. Remaining silent makes one an accomplice. The silent onlooker is a tragic figure who, because of moral weakness, brings suffering upon him/herself and upon others."

The problem with American foreign policy regarding Iran is not only its lack of courage, as Sharansky suggests. To borrow from Rabbi Angel, it is also its shameful moral silence. ■

We need more CEOs like Dan Price

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Barrick Gold Corp. has agreed to revamp its executive compensation after shareholders overwhelmingly rejected a pay package of $12.9 million for chairman John Thornton. Considering that Barrick's share price has declined 75 per cent over the past five years and 20 per cent in the past year since Thornton was appointed, such a reaction is not unreasonable.

I fully appreciate that executives are evaluated by many measures, and it's quite possible a leader whose company is losing money may be doing a great job under the circumstances. Nonetheless, there something is amiss when a company that lost $2.85 billion in the last quarter alone and $2.91 billion in 2014 pays its top executives millions.

To be honest, I find it hard to justify that anyone, no matter how successful, should take home $13 million a year – and I strongly believe in free markets and capitalism. But while it's foreign to many, Judaism stresses the importance of limits, modesty and restraint. It's not just the amount that's excessive – it's the gap between those who occupy corner offices and those who are the nuts and bolts of the organization. Such a salary represents 250 times that of the average worker. A generation ago, the multiple would have been more like 20. This income gap, with greater amounts of income controlled by fewer and fewer people, can be unhealthy for society as a whole. This problem is acute in Israel, which has one of highest rates of income inequality in the western world.

All this makes the actions of Dan Price, CEO of Gravity Payments, even more remarkable. He has introduced a minimum wage of $70,000 for all 120 of his employees. This will mean raises for 70 and the doubling of salaries for 30 "lucky" employees. He based the amount on a study on happiness co-authored by Nobel laureate Daniel Kahneman (who taught at Hebrew University for many years) that found emotional well-being rises as salary increases up to, but not beyond, $75,000. "We conclude that high income buys life satisfaction, but not happiness, and that low income is associated both with low life evaluation and low emotional well-being," he wrote.

Perhaps even more astounding, the salary increases were largely paid by Price himself, who took a pay cut from $1-million to – you guessed it - $70,000. As he noted "The market rate for me as a CEO compared to a regular person is ridiculous. It's absurd." It should come as no surprise that his company donates 10 per cent of its profits to charity.

Though many will try to deny it, the "debate" surrounding proper compensation ultimately boils down to whether one sees money as an end in itself or a means to an end. Those in the former camp will seek to maximize their earnings, in ways that are perfectly legal and may even be compelling if one only evaluates the contributions of the person. If one, however, takes a broader view and considers the impact of one's earnings on others, one will be quite content with somewhat less. Try as we may to ignore what we instinctively know and what research shows, beyond the first $75,000 or so, money just can't buy happiness. Our sages expressed this sentiment with their well-known teaching, "Who is wealthy? One who is happy with his lot."

Many Jews pray three times a day for material blessings, which are wonderful. But our emphasis on modesty ipso facto means that those who have great material blessings are meant to share them with others. Think of how many people would benefit if a corporate executive took a pay cut from $10 million to $5 million instead of laying off 75 workers.

We need more Dan Prices – if only to offer some counterbalance to what all too often goes on in executive suites, and to share happiness with many. ■

A 'woman of valour' as a eulogy?

Norma Baumel Joseph

Why is it that we frequently hear eulogies honouring Jewish women using the Proverbs poem of Eshet Chayil, A Woman of Valour? Is this the only resource we have for praising women?

Recently, in these pages, Lauren Kramer wrote that she is "Happy to skip the Eshet Chayil." She explained quite thoroughly why this particular poem seems anachronistic and problematic. Far from feeling praised, she and many women like her find it insulting. I too admit that my family does not sing this song Friday night. I do not aspire to the standard of one who works so hard while her (lazy) husband sits at the city gates receiving praise!

Friends have argued with me, and even offered better translations than the outdated one that Kramer uses. But, as she vigilantly notes, this is not about the ancient meaning or attributions of the text, but rather its current usage.

It is not so much that I find it "simply absurd" as that I believe women do not grasp the meaning of the words and would not normally agree to those standards. In fact, neither do the rabbis. Our rabbinic commentators often attribute great beauty to our female ancestors. Their declaration that our matriarchs like Sarah were beautiful was heartfelt and consistent.

We can understand that their description was not merely a statement of physical beauty, but rather encompassed moral and spiritual beauty. So how can we proudly proclaim, "Grace is deceitful and beauty is vain?" Beauty, both physical and spiritual, is continuously an important factor in our lives. It pertains to our esthetic sense and we experience it as part of the completeness of our lives.

I certainly do not mean to oppose praising of women. Far from that. My complaint focuses on the poem itself not the ritual practice of extoling women. And while I do find some of the phrases inappropriate, I also recognize that many women glory in their roles as mothers, homemakers and businesswomen. So, parts of the tale do appear to fit some women. Certainly, many women enjoy this serenade. It has even been recited at some wedding ceremonies.

> Our tradition is rich in potential sources by and about women

But with a tradition so rich in history and poetry, why is it that this is the only text we can find for our eulogies? In fact, I would say that it is this over-usage that prevents me from enjoying any reciting of that song.

Our tradition is rich in potential sources by and about women. In the biblical corpus itself, there are numerous women heroines, including Ruth whom Boaz calls an Eshet Chayil. We also can find the songs by extraordinary women such as Deborah, Hanna and Miriam. So why not pursue these sources?

Furthermore, there are so many Jewish women in history who have paved the way for our people's survival. Should we not recognize them or use their stories to highlight the currently deceased?

I know this will involve more work, but the lives and names of these women are known and easily available. People can look up any name online in the Jewish Women's Encyclopedia. There are memoirs and history books. Recently, I received a list of great females in Israel's current history that has more than 200 names. I myself teach five distinct courses on Jewish women.

When I first started teaching, there were few resources, but now I am overwhelmed with sources. Cheryl Tallen of Toronto produced an annotated bibliography of Jewish women in the medieval period of over 55 pages. That collection alone is a significant indicator of our long history and the role great Jewish women played in creating and preserving that heritage.

At the moment of death, we can look back on one lifetime and recognize its significance in the context of our rich heritage. Especially at that moment, this heritage should not be reduced to one poem. ■

Canadian Orthodox rabbis note shift on LGBTQ inclusion

jshupac@thecjn.ca

While Canadian modern Orthodox rabbis aren't having the kind of public discussion about including LGBTQ Jews like their counterparts did last month in New York, many say they've been grappling with the issue for years and agree there's been a shift toward greater sensitivity to the issue.

Rabbi Michael Whitman of Adath Israel Poale Zedek Anshei Ozeroff Synagogue in Hampstead, Que., and former president of the Rabbinical Council of Montreal, said that in the past two decades, modern Orthodoxy has moved from the attitude that homosexuality is deviant to "we don't agree with the behaviour, but want to support the difficulties [gay and lesbian] people face."

An April 19 conference at Columbia University, titled "Faith, Desire and Psychotherapy," brought together for the first time modern Orthodox rabbis and mental health professionals to explore best practices for serving LGBTQ Jews in the Orthodox community.

Attended by more than 120 mental health workers, educators, students and rabbis, the event addressed rabbis' struggles to balance sensitivity with the preservation of Jewish law, as well as the Orthodox community's past tendency to pathologize homosexuality and options for training for rabbis, educators and mental health professionals.

Conference speakers included Rabbi Mark Dratch, executive vice-president of the Rabbinic Council of America (RCA); Rabbi Shmuel Goldin, former president of the RCA; Rabbi Shaul Robinson, spiritual leader of Manhattan's Lincoln Square Synagogue (one of the event's co-sponsors); and Rabbi Nathaniel Helfgot, a faculty member at Yeshivat Chovevei Torah and the author of a 2010 declaration calling for acceptance of LGBTQ Jews in the Orthodox community.

Rabbi Helfgot's declaration, signed by 150 modern Orthodox rabbis on both sides of the border, stressed that "conversion therapies," which attempt to make a person heterosexual, and pressuring gay people to marry opposite-sex partners are dangerous from a mental health standpoint.

In 2012, the RCA, to which a number of Canadian rabbis belong, rejected conversion therapy outright.

Formal conversations aside, the question of how to reconcile homosexuality and halachic Judaism has been on the minds of many Canadian modern Orthodox rabbis for years.

"Programs [like the one at Columbia] are behind the curve," Rabbi Whitman said. "While there's no change in halachic standards, there are vast changes in attitudes, sensitivities and ways of dealing with people. The conference reflects these important changes, but... for years I've been speaking publicly and doing private counselling around this issue, recognizing that certain behaviours aren't in accordance with the Torah, but we don't apply a moral judgment."

About a decade ago, Rabbi Whitman said, he spoke about homosexuality at an event at McGill University, and for years he's spoken out against conversion therapy and the damage it does.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

While he wouldn't officiate at a same-sex wedding, he said, he welcomes gay and lesbian singles and couples as "members and leaders" of his synagogue.

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, said the Canadian Orthodox community tends to be more conservative than in places such as New York and California, and while it's apparently not engaged in formal discussion on the topic, "almost any Orthodox rabbi has had to deal with this on some level... If you have a congregant who's gay or one with a child who's gay, it requires you to address it and be as sensitive and compassionate as possible."

Rabbi Korobkin said the local rabbinate seems to have largely steered away from conversion therapy, and while an Orthodox rabbi likely wouldn't tell a gay congregant, "I accept what you do," he would say, "I accept who you are and you're welcome in my home, congregation and community," just as a congregant who doesn't keep kosher or observe Shabbat is welcomed.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation said Canadian modern Orthodox rabbis face the same challenges as those in New York.

"I think going back a generation, the sensitive approach was 'Let's see if we can counsel a person away from homosexuality,' whereas now, the approach is, 'How do we... accept them into our community, but still champion our tradition on a very important issue?'" he said.

Justine Apple, executive director of Jewish LGBTQ group Kulanu Toronto, said she would love to see Toronto hold a conference like the one at Columbia. "There's definitely space and a need for it here," she said.

She said the Reform and, increasingly, the Conservative movements in Canada have been making headway on LGBTQ inclusion, but "we have a long way to go in the Orthodox community," particularly since Orthodox rabbis here seem to be less progressive than their U.S. counterparts.

"I think a lot of LGBTQ Jews are seen as invisible in the Orthodox community," she said. "I'd like to see Orthodox rabbis practising more inclusive policies at their synagogues."

While she recognized that this could take time, Apple said, "it would be really good to see some change and a bit more openness. We can use the United States as a role model for that." ■

Jewish groups raise money for Nepal quake relief

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Although they're half a world away from the crisis, Canadian Jewish organizations are collecting money to help the hundreds of thousands of people suffering in Nepal due to the worst natural disaster the region has seen in 80 years.

Robyn Segall, Ve'ahavta's communications director, said that according to the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), a partner agency that has sent a team to Nepal to co-ordinate relief efforts on the ground, the 7.8-magnitude earthquake that devastated Nepal on April 25 has resulted in a climbing death toll of 5,000 and left more than 20,000 people injured along with more than 1 million homeless or displaced.

In the days following the quake, Canadian Jewish organizations set up relief funds to collect donations for the victims.

Ve'ahavta set up its Nepal Crisis Fund on April 27 and has since collected more than $25,000 as of May 4.

Following a conference call between Ve'ahavta staff and JDC volunteers on the ground in Nepal, Segall told The CJN that one of the biggest challenges is getting their hands on the much-needed supplies that are coming in.

"The land is so destroyed that they are having trouble with planes and vehicles getting where they need to go," Segall said.

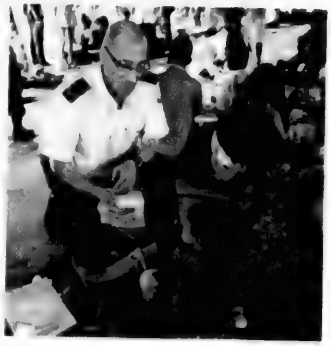
"The priority is to take care of that so supplies can come in. The airport is completely backlogged with supplies, and people on the ground can't actually distribute them to the people that need them, because the roads are in really bad shape."

She said volunteers are currently focusing their efforts on providing medical care and are working with the staff at the Israel Defence Forces field hospital in Kathmandu, the capital.

"People are still being uncovered from the rubble, so it's still a state of emergency," she said.

Jewish Federations of Canada – United Israel Appeal is also collecting donations through its Nepal Relief Fund. Donations can be made through federations in Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, London, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Vancouver, Windsor and Winnipeg.

Dan Horowitz, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's editorial director and senior writer, said Toronto's Nepal fund was set up April 27 and had collected more than $64,000 from some 500 donors as of May 4.



The IDF's field hospital in Kathmandu began operating April 29. ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

All of the funds raised by the federations will be allocated to the JDC, which is working to provide humanitarian aid.

"They're still evaluating the needs, but they've already released money for the basic human needs – water, food. Also, sanitation is crucial, because in this situation, diseases occur," Horowitz said.

Sailendra Adhikar, a 27-year-old Kathmandu native who came to Toronto in 2010 and works as a security guard at the Lipa Green Centre, said he's grateful to federation for establishing a relief fund to help the survivors.

"Although I am very fortunate that the members of my family who still live in Nepal were unaffected by this tragedy, I know many others who are not as lucky," he said.

Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario has also set up a Nepal Jewish Relief Fund to assist the Chabad Center in Kathmandu, which has been operating as a refuge for Israeli backpackers and other victims. The Chabad Centre has been providing food and shelter, but their supplies are quickly dwindling.

On April 27, the federal government said it will match donations to Canadian relief funds set up to help the victims in Nepal.

Segall said she would be happy to assist other Jewish groups, such as shuls, that are raising money for the cause.

"We're also happy to work directly with synagogues on the allocation of the funds they collect. Sometimes they don't have the networks to understand how to best use their funds, so we're more than happy to collaborate and help them distribute their funds in the most effective way possible." ■

Event marks 70th anniversary of the end of WWII

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

The Canadian War Museum was once again the site of the National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony, this year marking the 70th anniversary of the end of World War II.

The ceremony, held April 28 and organized by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, was attended by 550 people, including a large contingent from the diplomatic community, as well as local politicians, survivors and members of the public. This year's theme was "70 Years Since the End of the War: The Pain of Liberation and Rebuilding a Life."

Fran Sonshine, national chair of Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and MC for the event, told the audience that she had been born in Cyprus, the child of survivors, and that her husband had been born in Bergen-Belsen.

Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak described the journey of the Jewish People from survival to triumph.

"While the world celebrated the end of the war, the Jewish People mourned their losses," he said. "Armed with nothing but resilience and determination, they rebuilt their lives."

He expressed gratitude to Canada for its strong support for the State of Israel, "the shelter and homeland of the Jewish People."

Defence Minister Jason Kenney, representing the government, announced that "Parliament has designated the month of April as Genocide Remembrance and Commemoration Month" and that "we will soon see the national Holocaust monument rise within sight of this place as a sign for future generations."

Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau and Green Party Leader Elizabeth May also shared messages of solidarity, while an emotional Thomas Mulcair, leader of the Official Opposition, told of visiting Dachau with a group of fellow high school students in the 1960s and of a family trip to France last summer with his wife, Catherine Pinhas, who is Jewish, and his mother-in-law.

His mother-in-law had survived the war and was returning for the first time. "I want Catherine's and my own grandchildren to know how real that was," he said.

Groups of survivors, along with politicians and dignitaries, lit candles in memory of those who died in the Holocaust.

Defence Minister Jason Kenney, right, lights the first candle on the Yad Vashem menorah in memory of the six million Jews who died in the Shoah, together with Holocaust survivor Victor David. DAVID AMOILS PHOTOGRAPHY

Dana Bell, a child Holocaust survivor whose family annually sponsors educators from Quebec to go to Yad Vashem, was accompanied by her grandson Richard Pascal as she told her personal story.

"You are looking at a miracle. It is a miracle that I survived," said Bell, who has written a memoir that was among the volumes of Holocaust memoirs published by the Azrieli Foundation that were made available to attendees to take with them.

Prior to the main ceremony, a group of more than 130 high school students from Ontario and Quebec of various faiths and cultures participated in a new program called "Ambassadors of Change," in which they sat with survivors, listened to their stories and engaged in dialogue.

Led by Ottawa teacher Patrick Mascoe, who is dedicated to Holocaust education in the schools, the students then joined the main ceremony, which concluded with them placing yellow flowers near the memorial candles.

Cantor Moshe Kraus, a Holocaust survivor now in his 90s, recited Kel Malei Rachamim and led the Jewish audience members in Kaddish. The Jewish War Veterans of Canada then marched off the colours. ■

Arabic paper says killing entrenched in the Jewish faith

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

They're at it again.

Meshwar, an Arabic-language newspaper headquartered in Mississauga, has drawn the ire of Jewish groups for an article that labels Judaism as a terrorist religion and says killing is ingrained in the Jewish faith.

The article appeared in the newspaper's April edition and is a reprint of an item that appeared previously in Al Jazeera. The article was first reported in the Elder of Zion blog and picked up by Honest Reporting Canada.

"This is the same publication that praised the Har Nof synagogue massacre in which four rabbis and a police officer were murdered," said Mike Fegelman, executive-director of Honest Reporting Canada.

"A police complaint has already been filed by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) over that editorial."

"With content like this freely distributed to its claimed 4,000 readers in Ontario, it's no surprise that Toronto Police released findings in March, which noted that Jews are the most targeted group for hate crimes in the city," Fegelman added.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach of CIJA, said the organization has already made four separate complaints to police hate crime authorities in Peel Region over anti-Jewish content in Meshwar.

One concerned a cartoon depicting Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu drinking the blood of Palestinian children. Another arose from a November 2014 editorial that praised the Har Nof terrorist attack in Israel. Yet another was in response to an August 2014 editorial that denied the Holocaust, he said.

Rudner said CIJA hadn't yet had the most recent item translated, but "if the description that has been provided through Honest Reporting is accurate, we feel there may be grounds to file another complaint with Peel Regional Police."

Jonathan Halevi has been following Meshwar and the writings of its editor, Nazih Khatatba, for some time. Halevi, who reads Arabic, said the article builds on traditional Islamic doctrine, which sees Judaism as a corruption of the ancient Islamic faith of the patriarchs.

This article in Meshwar upset Jewish groups.

The article refers to the ancient warrior, Joshua, and said the concept of killing others is well entrenched in the Jewish faith. He also compared the ancient Israelites to events in Gaza today, Halevi said.

It condemned Judaism for its treatment of women and said Jews see gentiles as unclean and vile, Halevi said.

"The article takes [biblical] quotes from here and there and compares [them] to Israel today.

"This is rubbish. [The author] really doesn't understand Judaism. He misquotes what was said and builds a theory around it. It's a very low level of argument. But it's part of the line of the newspaper in demonizing Israel and demonizing Judaism."

Halevi, who served in the Israeli intelligence service, said he had written about Meshwar on his blog, Alternative Angle, and about Khatatba, who is also a board member of Palestine House.

Halevi noted that Khatatba praised the Har Nof massacre, and called it "an attack with several innovative tactics culminating in the courageous and qualitative al-Quds operation, which was carried out by two Palestinians in a Jewish synagogue."

Khatatba went on to describe the massacre as "self-defence and rescue for the Palestinian people," Halevi noted on his blog.

The CJN contacted Khatatba, but he said he was "too busy" for an interview. ■

Pro-peace lawyer says Jerusalem is already divided

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jerusalem can neither be considered an exclusively Jewish city nor the undivided capital of Israel.

This was the central premise of a talk given April 30 by Daniel Seidemann, an American-Israeli, internationally recognized lawyer, peace advocate and founder and director of Terrestrial Jerusalem, an Israeli NGO that tracks developments in Jerusalem thought to lead to violence, humanitarian crises or political unrest.

As a lawyer, Seidemann has represented both Israeli and Palestinian residents of Jerusalem and has defended people negatively affected by the expansion of Jewish settlements in and around Jerusalem.

"If you come to me and say, 'I don't believe a two-state solution is possible'... Or that we shouldn't cede any territory to them, I'll disagree with you, but feel you could make a compelling piece," Seidemann said.

"But if you tell me we could reach an agreement that includes holding onto Jerusalem and keeping it an Israeli city, despite the large disenfranchised Palestinian population there, I'll quietly take you outside and ask you what you've been smoking," Seidemann told a group of about 40 people who gathered at Holy Blossom Temple to hear him speak about the status and future of Jerusalem.

His talk was presented by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

A retired reserve major in the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) and a self-proclaimed "unabashed Zionist," Seidemann argued that while the commitment of so many Israeli and Diaspora Jews to preserve Jerusalem as an undisputed Jewish capital comes from "a noble place," it fails to acknowledge empirical reality: Israel annexed east Jerusalem in 1967 and roughly 38 per cent of Jerusalem's population comprises Palestinians who aren't Israeli citizens and can't vote in national elections.

"In the next 15 or 20 years or so, Jerusalem will have a Palestinian majority," Seidemann said. "Thirty-eight per cent of people in Jerusalem see my [national] independence day as their Nakba... So Jerusalem is not an Israeli city, it's a bi-national city."

He emphasized the city's divided nature, saying that Jews are afraid to go into east Jerusalem, and Palestinians are afraid to enter west Jerusalem.

The latter are scared because Jewish vigilante groups are known to go out "hunting for Palestinians for fun," Seidemann said.

"I say this with pain, but we have an inherently dysfunctional Jerusalem and a city that's detached from reality."

Seidemann clarified that he doesn't believe, as do some left-wing ideologues, that Zionism equates to racism, but he notes that since 1967, Israel has been occupying the West Bank and east Jerusalem, "even though we didn't choose to do so" and is thereby doing itself a great disservice.

"We are confronting an existential challenge of the highest order," he warned. "There's no greater threat to Israel than our sliding into a bi-national state, because this will condemn us to becoming perpetual occupiers... We have no business ruling the Palestinians, and we don't want to be there."

Israel's ongoing policy of settlement expansion is highly self-destructive and will only serve to further isolate the country internationally, Seidemann said.

Having recently met with decision-makers in Washington, Seidemann said U.S. politicians are increasingly at a loss regarding how to help reach a peace deal between the Israelis and Palestinians.

He urged Jews in places such as Canada and the United States to allow for critical conversations on the issue to occur, even if they don't agree with everything being said.

"So much of the conversation in the U.S. and Canada is dominated by people who love Israel so much they want Jerusalem to be an Armageddon playground. It's a strange way of showing love. On the other side, there are the anti-Israel BDS people... Let's bring back the middle ground and leave the crazies and the anti-Semites aside," he said. ■

This Victoria Day you have a choice: UJA's Run or Walk with Israel

By Daniel Horowitz

It's incredible what can develop from a simple conversation between friends. A couple of years ago, while Sam Mizrahi was co-chairing UJA's Walk with Israel, his friend and self-described "weekend runner" Jordan Korenzvit suggested that if there was a way to run on behalf of Israel, he'd love to lend his legs to that particular cause. The idea, which germinated with an off-the-cuff dialogue between buddies was taken to UJA, who took it to the City of Toronto to work out the logistics, and, after a couple of years to sort things out, UJA's Run with Israel is here.

Taking to the streets of downtown Toronto prior to the start of UJA's Walk with Israel on Monday, May 18, Victoria Day, funds raised for the six kilometre Run, like the Walk, will support UJA Federation's ongoing, transformative projects in Israel that are literally changing people's lives.

Both the Run and Walk will share the same route through the streets of downtown Toronto. Both routes are 6km in length, and will culminate outdoors at Ontario Place for the Renee & Irwin Nadal Festival.

"I have been running a successful community event – the Yorkville Run – and I wanted to combine my knowledge of organizing that run and apply it to fundraising and awareness for Israel," says Korenzvit, Chair of the Run For Israel, along with Mizrahi. "The idea of adding a run is to bring in the demographic that is currently running other runs, for other causes, and give them the option of running for Israel. I am very excited to have the opportunity to run through the Princes' Gate, to the finish line at Ontario Place. I've never done that before and I think it will be a great experience for everyone who does the Run with Israel."

"People who run regularly are passionate about it," says Mizrahi. "By providing these people who share a similar value system with the Run with Israel, it is giving them the opportunity to express and indulge not only their passion for running, but their passion for Israel, and the perfect chance to combine both of those passions to benefit the Jewish State."

"It's very exciting that this year we have two options available for people to show their love for, and support of Israel," says Marcy Abramsky, who is Chairing the Walk for the second straight year. "The bottom line is, whether you walk or run, you will be supporting and strengthening the people of Israel."

Abramsky, who took part in a UJA Federation fact-finding mission to Israel in January, saw firsthand, the projects and the people that funds raised by the Walk and Run will support.

"It was so moving to see the people who our community helps through the Walk, year after year," she says. "It's important to remember that the faces you see on the Walk signs around the city are real people, people who will benefit from the Walk and Run, and each one of those people represent thousands more just like them."

Whether you choose to walk or run, the day promises to be an unforgettable one as participants come together to support Israel while enjoying a day of fresh air and exercise, followed by games, rides, activities, UJA's Shinshinim, and a delicious kosher barbecue sponsored by Sobey's.

UJA's Walk with Israel is sponsored by RioCan and Mizrahi Development. UJA's Run with Israel is sponsored by Yogen Früz.

Over 16,000 took part in last year's UJA Walk with Israel

When you raise money for UJA's Walk or Run with Israel, you strengthen the people of Israel. People like Adina.

It wasn't easy for Adina to move her family from the relative safety and comfort of Jerusalem to the uncertainty of a life in UJA Federation's partner community of Sderot, which sits less than a mile from Gaza. But it was a conscious decision, one she made 15 years ago with her husband and six daughters. It wasn't long before Sderot was the target of unrelenting mortar and missile attacks from Gaza. Adina and her husband quickly adapted to their new reality, consumed with the whereabouts of their young girls at all times. With only 15 seconds to find shelter before an attack, Adina and her family often found themselves confined to the indoors, rarely venturing outside. While she sits in an outdoor playground at her children's daycare furnished by the generous donations from UJA's Israel Emergency Relief Fund, she is thoughtful about her commitment to living in Sderot. After last summer's Gaza conflict, Adina has been shaken by the constant barrage of indiscriminate rockets but she is adamant that her family's place is in Sderot. She is both comforted and strengthened to know that she is part of the global Jewish family, and that the Jewish community of Toronto, through UJA, support people like her, and are looking out for all the people of Sderot.

Hillel awards honour chesed and community

jshupac@thecjn.ca

With the theme of this year's Hillel of Greater Toronto's awards night being "chesed and community," it was fitting that the 25 award recipients included both Jewish and non-Jewish students who have devoted themselves to fostering Jewish life on their Toronto university campuses.

The annual awards night, held this year on April 29 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life and attended by about 80 people, honoured student leaders on Toronto campuses that have a Hillel presence, including York University, the University of Toronto, Ryerson University, Glendon College, Seneca College, OCAD University and University of Toronto Mississauga.

"We've started branching out to smaller college campuses where there are Jewish students who would like to start a Jewish presence," said Allysa Moses, Hillel co-ordinator at Ryerson and co-organizer of the awards event, along with Tamara Caplan, director of Hillel at York.

The awards were divided into different categories, and recipients were determined by Hillel members across the city, Moses explained, such as the Passion for Planning Award, given to all students who sat on volunteer-run, Hillel student boards at their various campuses, an Internship Completion Award for each campus's Hillel interns, and the Emerging Communities Engagement Award, which honoured students who have been working to establish Jewish community life on campuses with smaller Jewish populations.

In addition, several Community Partnership Awards were given to non-Jewish student leaders who have worked with Hillel.

These included leaders from the Ryerson Hellenic Student Association, which has, Moses said, co-organized events with Hillel and promoted some of Hillel's events and the leader of the Chinese Students & Scholars Association at U of T, which collaborated with Hillel on an exhibit documenting the experience of Jews who fled Nazi-occupied Europe for Shanghai during World War II.

Israel Engagement Internship Awards were given to student interns at Ryerson who participated in a program in which they spoke about Israel with both Jewish and non-Jewish students across academic departments.

"So, an intern studying social work would meet with Jewish and non-Jewish students and tell them about work and innovations that Israel is doing in social work," Moses said.

Two students also received Commitment to Jewish Life Awards for exemplifying outstanding leadership on campus.

Ruchie Shainhouse, who won the Ryerson Commitment to Jewish Life Award, has shown "four years of dedication to Hillel at Ryerson, been on the Hillel board for four years, and went above and beyond to create a strong Jewish community on campus and make sure events are creative, fun and vibrant," Moses said.

For instance, this past year, Shainhouse created the first citywide Hillel semi-formal, held at Ryerson.

The event included speakers such as Marc Newburgh, Hillel's executive director, who spoke about the March of the Living trip that he recently returned from and how he was deeply inspired by the positive attitude exhibited by one of the accompanying Holocaust survivors.

He emphasized the strength of the Jewish people and praised the Hillel student leaders for proudly displaying their passion for being Jewish and for Israel on campuses where many people don't look favourably on Israel.

"It was a really enjoyable evening and the students felt they contributed a lot to Hillel and that they are appreciated and encouraged in their Jewish leadership," Moses said. ■

From Ezras Noshem to the SINAI HEALTH SYSTEM

"If I am not for myself, then who will be for me? If I am only for myself, then what am I? And if not now, when?"
- Hillel, Pirkei Avot

The women of Ezras Noshem who founded Mount Sinai Hospital in 1923 were motivated to create a place of practice and healing with Hillel's ethical teachings in mind - to do good for their community and the community at large.

Mount Sinai Hospital, part of the Sinai Health System, stands strong today as a world leader in quality patient care and innovative research, fostering a culture of excellence, diversity and philanthropy.

Sinai Health System is comprised of Mount Sinai Hospital, Bridgepoint Active Healthcare, Lunenfeld-Tanenbaum Research Institute and Circle of Care. Together, they will create a premier exemplar of an integrated health system.

Give young Jews a reason to love Israel, rabbi urges

plungen@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Donniel Hartman, right, with CJN editor Yoni Goldstein RABBI ADAM CUTLER PHOTO

As Rabbi Donniel Hartman reflected on his Zionist youth, he recalled that as a bar mitzvah boy he had "bought" a tree in Israel – or at least, a part of one.

The memory still brought a smile to his face. "What a beautiful idea," he reminisced.

Today, however, it's not enough to plant trees in Israel. "We have to plant ideas," he said.

All Jews have a stake in the future of Israel, not just in the land but in its cultural values and principles, he said. We need to shift away from a longstanding focus on "continuity Zionism," which was concerned with the survival of the Jewish People and the preservation of the State of Israel, and turn to support for "cultural Zionism."

That's an aspirational Zionism that seeks to make Israel not just a state of the Jews, but also a Jewish state, one imbued with Jewish ideals, Jewish principles, Jewish culture and a Jewish way of doing things. It is open, accepting, democratic and tolerant, he said.

Rabbi Hartman, president of the Jerusalem-based Shalom Hartman Institute, addressed the topic, "Talking about Israel, the need for a new conversation."

At a community gathering sponsored by The CJN in association with the Shalom Hartman Institute and hosted by Beth Tzedec Congregation on April 27, he encouraged Diaspora Jews to make their voices heard and influence the discussion about the future of Zionism. Doing so is necessary to preserve Zionism's appeal to future generations.

He said continuity Zionism makes no sense to young people in Canada and the United States. Their experience is not of rampant anti-Semitism, but of welcoming societies in which they feel safe, where intermarriage is high in the United States and growing in Canada, where Israel is more powerful than its enemies and where the Holocaust increasingly recedes into history.

An appeal to their Zionist sympathies based on concerns over the safety and security of the Jewish People will fall on deaf ears, Rabbi Hartman argued.

Instead, Jews must focus on a cultural renaissance in which Israel will nurture a democratic, pluralistic, tolerant and expansive version of Judaism, a "Judaism on steroids… the best of what we are."

He said too many policies of the current government are influenced by concerns over security and "continuity Zionism." He criticized the government for failing to welcome 50,000 African refugees, instead referring to them as infiltrators. He said such an attitude ignores Jewish tradition, which taught that all people are created in God's image and that Jews were once strangers in Egypt.

He called on Israel to be "an exemplar of how you treat refugees."

He said a Jewish state is obliged to pursue peace, even if there is no discernible peace partner.

"At least you keep it on the table. That's what a Jewish state is about," he said.

Rabbi Hartman asked an audience of 390 people to consider "how we, the lovers of Israel, create a future for the lovers of Israel." Is the community laying a foundation so that in 20 years, the room in which he spoke will again be filled with lovers of Israel? For that to happen, he suggested, you have to give young people another reason beyond continuity Zionism, to support Israel.

Going back to the 19th century, he made a compelling case for Israel as a state for the Jews – a refuge from anti-Semitism and a place where Jews could live without discrimination.

However, there was an element within Zionism that did not see a state for the Jews as a goal in itself, he continued. "Jews never saw continuity as an end in itself. To be a Jew meant to strive for something."

Cultural Zionism looked at ways Jews could be a holy people, as expressed at the national level. Their goal was to bring Jews together to create a cultural renaissance, a society worthy of the idea of Jews as a holy people, he said.

In their national home, Jews would take what is best from their own tradition, adapt influences from other civilizations, and become players on the international scene, not just spectators. In that way, they would become a light unto the nations, he said.

But in the aftermath of the Holocaust, continuity Zionism naturally took precedence. Over the years, weaknesses in that approach emerged. Palestinians ask why they should pay the price for Auschwitz, Rabbi Hartman said.

And for young Jews, continuity Zionism is "not coherent." The legitimacy of Israel based on the Holocaust does not resonate.

Instead, an aspirational Zionism is the best way to gain support.

The greatness of life is not measured by what you achieve, Rabbi Hartman said, "but by what you yearn for."

Others to address the event included Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, CJN president Elizabeth Wolfe, and DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada. CJN editor Yoni Goldstein served as moderator of a question and answer session following Rabbi Hartman's address. ■

Ordaining intermarried rabbis is not the answer

RABBI TINA GRIMBERG

Can a rabbi intermarry? This is the question. The issue is complicated and rich; it is controversial and divisive. If my email inbox is any indication, the passions run high.

Dating as a rabbinical student or rabbi, especially as a woman, presents enormous challenges. I met my husband in my last year of rabbinical school, so I know this first-hand. Even among liberal Jewish circles, Shabbat observance – both Friday and Saturday – was a hard sell. "So what's your weekend like?" he asked, sitting across the table at a Lower Manhattan Starbucks.

"Friday night I'm on the pulpit for Kabbalat Shabbat services." I responded. "Saturday morning, there's a bar mitzvah, and Sunday morning, there's family programming at the Hebrew School, and maybe a hospital visit thrown in somewhere in between."

Really?" responded this intelligent, Jewishly conscious man. "I have a cottage outside New York. I work hard all week so I can be there by 4 p.m. on Friday. Does that mean you will not be able to join me?"

I stared at my cup of coffee and realized that between my Jewish professional commitment and the social demands of relationships, there lay an ocean.

The Reconstructionist movement is tiny. The congregations within it are also, for the most part, small. Only a handful of synagogues have memberships of more than 500 households. Within the liberal Jewish spectrum, Reconstructionist Judaism is certainly the minority. Take for example, the Reform movement, which has 101 affiliate congregations in New York state alone. The Reconstructionists? One hundred and five across the entire world. The 2014 graduating class of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College was six students.

In other words, the conversation about this is a lot bigger than the issue itself. Why the controversy, then?

Proponents of ordaining intercoupled rabbinical students argue that intermarried rabbis are likely to be more successful in attracting and integrating interfaith couples into the Jewish world. I would like to challenge this idea. I have been working with interfaith couples for the last 20 years, and I can say, both as a rabbi and as a family therapist, that the identity of a rabbi's partner has little to do with his or her ability to engage interfaith families in Jewish life. Working in private practice, as well as in New York at the 92nd Street Y, the JCC, a Reform synagogue in Brooklyn, and in Toronto at my current pulpit at Congregation Darchei Noam, I have noticed over the years that people are searching for a place with no judgment. A place of Jewish meaning where they feel pastorally understood and communally stimulated. They are looking for communities that share their values. And, above all, they are looking for Jewish experiences.

Interfaith families come to Jewish institutions to foster their Jewish identities. They are here to learn; they are here to share life's joyous moments; they are here for support while they grieve. It is the job of the rabbi, and one that I take very seriously, to acknowledge the unique identity of all of the members of the community – whether they come from a Jewish background or not. The rabbi becomes, for his or her congregation, a mentor.

What matters most is the ability to build a bridge. Empathy, understanding, real engagement in people's lives and deep respect for their stories is what fosters integration. What we know is that integration is currently working better than it ever has, as rabbis across the liberal movements, along with their communities, open doors and their embrace to the diversity of Jewish life and experiences.

The skills to work with intermarried couples are expected of pulpit rabbis in congregations across North America. Even Orthodox rabbis come face to face with these issues. How do we know that integration is working? The numbers tell us. We see a growing number of children of intermarriages who identify as Jewish – the Pew Research Center's fantastic 2013 Survey of American Jews tells us that.

The number of Jewish life-cycle events – brit milah or milah l'shem gerut (for conversion) ceremonies, baby namings, b'nei mitzvah – of children of intermarried couples keeps growing. Every year, more people in interfaith relationships come into my office seeking support and counsel in order to enhance and deepen their Jewish life.

In a world of such autonomous choices for liberal Jews who see rabbinic authority on a continuum, when one rabbi disagrees with them, another rabbi who will agree is a Google search away.

The Jewish life of a rabbi has never been meant to be a mirror for his or her community. The rabbi is an example, a model and a guide. To ordain intermarried rabbis just to reflect a growing portion of the Jewish community does not answer or solve the issues at hand. ■

Rabbi Tina Grimberg is the rabbi at Congregation Darchei Noam, the Reconstructionist synagogue of Toronto.

Why I am opposed to lifting the ban on rabbis with non-Jewish partners

RABBI RON AIGEN

One of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan's major contributions to modern Jewish identity was to note that Judaism has always placed the emphasis on belonging over believing. By focusing on peoplehood and the notion of belonging to the Jewish People as the normative criteria for defining oneself as a Jew, the founder of the Reconstructionist approach to Judaism was articulating the way most Jews in the modern period self-identify. But more than that, Rabbi Kaplan also captured the traditional uniqueness of Judaism as being more than a religious faith between the individual and God.

Judaism has always been about the creation of a collective identity, of being part of a family, a tribe or, in Rabbi Kaplan's terms, a civilization, sharing in a culture and way of life. From the very outset Abraham was not an individual seeker of God – he did not go on his spiritual journey alone. He went together with his wife, Sarah, his nephew Lot... "and the persons they acquired in Haran." The rabbis understood this (anachronistically) as referring to the converts they had led to embrace the one true God – Abraham converted the men and Sarah the women.

This midrash tells us two things: first, that Judaism was a family affair. The ideal model was for the whole family to share in and be engaged with the project of creating a Jewish way of life. Secondly, it tells us that this family was, from the very beginning, open to the idea of welcoming outsiders to join in and embrace their shared values and goals. It was never merely ethnic, it was always about creating a shared ethic.

The goals of Judaism were traditionally also focused more on the welfare of the collective than on the individual. Unlike other religious systems that focus on the salvation of the individual, in Judaism the individual traditionally found his or her fulfilment in the collective life of the people. Our messianic hopes were always for the return of the collective People of Israel to our homeland, and for the establishment of world peace and universal justice.

The notion that rabbis could or should offer a model of Jewish life that allows for a radically atomized notion of spirituality, creating within their own family a variety of individual choices that might offer the children a non-Jewish option for their personal fulfilment seems to be a shocking, radical break with the very essence of Judaism.

It indeed seems to be following the trend of our increasingly individualized culture, as described by sociologist Robert Putnam in Bowling Alone: the collapse and revival of American community and psychologist Sherry Turkel in Alone Together: why we expect more from technology and less from each other. Just when Judaism needs most to exercise its traditional role as being counter-cultural, it would be a tragic mistake for a rabbinical school to follow the drift of the wider secular society in which we find ourselves.

While it is true that many Jewish families are making this choice, and we make every effort to reach out to them, welcome them and help them to promote Jewish families when that is their aim, it is quite another thing to claim this is the ideal model. The statistics over the past decades have proven otherwise.

While it is possible to have some success in having committed Jewish children emerge from interfaith families, the success rate is not high. It is far from the majority of children raised in interfaith families who go on to build strong, committed Jewish families of their own.

Once rabbis are seen as positive models for creating interfaith families, there is no longer any argument to be made for in-marriage, or for encouraging conversion for the sake of promoting a stronger, shared Jewish identity in the family.

We need rabbis to be models for creating a commitment to building a Jewish way of life that promotes the communitarian ethos of Jewish Peoplehood. We need this not just because it's in our own tribal interests to do so. We need this as a model for creating a better world for all human beings. ■

Rabbi Ron Aigen is spiritual leader of Congregation Dorshei Emet, Montreal's Reconstructionist synagogue.

Rotstein was educator, economic nationalist, family man

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

To the Canadian public, Abraham "Abe" Rotstein was a prominent economic nationalist, an educator and a public intellectual who called for greater Canadian control over resources and the economy.

But he was also remembered as a devoted father, grandfather, and brother, someone who enjoyed music and travel, was a sharp dresser who was known affectionately as "Count Rotstein," and was not a particularly good driver.

Rotstein, professor emeritus of economics at the University of Toronto, died last week at age 86.

At his April 30 funeral at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, his son, Daniel, brother Morris and longtime friend Mel Watkins eulogized him as a beloved educator who possessed a sharp mind and a gentle touch.

Daniel recalled his father as a lover of the written word, who read and collected daily newspapers, international magazines and several publications from the Jewish press. "Rarely was any of these thrown out." Instead his father collected stacks of yellowing and dusty articles for future reference.

His father "liked to look good" and was known for his ties, cravats and cigarette holder. He "loved being Jewish" and ensured his children received a Jewish education, Daniel said.

His father grew up in Depression-era Montreal at a time when universities enforced a quota to limit the number of Jewish students. That pushed him to excel in all he pursued and to expect top marks from his own children, Daniel said.

Music was important to his father. The house was filled with classical, jazz and Jewish music, and later world music. The family would play together in the Rotstein Family Band, with Abe on violin, Daniel said.

Morris recalled his brother as part of a generation who grew up in hard times but succeeded in their various walks of life.

Abe was an outstanding student who excelled in both English and Hebrew schools. He was a leader in the local Zionist Habonim Dror youth movement and "he inspired and educated a wide range of young people in the Zionist idea," Morris said.

Abe studied economics at the University of Chicago and Columbia University before earning a doctorate from the University of Toronto. After some time in the private sector, he moved to academia. He edited Canadian Forum magazine, an important and thought-provoking publication at the time, and helped found the Committee for an Independent Canada in co-operation with former finance minister Walter Gordon. Rotstein published The Precarious Homestead, his most famous book, in 1973.

> He was an active, interested and committed Canadian. He was also a committed son of the Jewish People.

His brother was concerned foreign corporations would buy up Canadian resources and corporations and that Canada would lose control over its own economic fate, Morris said.

"He was an active, interested and committed Canadian. He was also a committed son of the Jewish People," Morris said.

Political economist Mel Watkins recalled a close friendship with Rotstein that spanned 55 years. Rotstein kept teaching long after his colleagues stopped doing so, he said.

In the 1960s, there was "a surge of pent up Canadian nationalism" and Rotstein was one of that movement's "leading theorists and most prominent and innovative practitioners," he said.

A public intellectual, he served as co-chair of the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy. Rotstein was a dissenter from mainstream politics and often found himself on the losing side of political debates, but he never lost his good cheer, Watkins said. He "was respected by his students as a gentleman, and as a gentle and patient person."

Watkins recalled Rotstein as a great friend who "was always there for you. He was a good and wise person."

Funeral services were officiated by Rabbi Miriam Margles, who noted Rotstein's "fierce intellect" and his non-judgmental interactions with others.

"He walked through life as an educator" and delivered his last lecture – to his grandson Lev's Grade 3 class, on the fur trade – only a few weeks ago.

"The world has lost a great teacher," Rabbi Margles said.

Rotstein is survived by son Daniel and his wife Azeema, and daughter Eve Rotstein and Theo Wibisono, as well as three grandchildren, his brother Morris and Joan Charlap. ■

Ex-Habs chief 'bullish' on Israeli economy

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

"I can't guarantee the Canadiens will win the Stanley Cup, but I can guarantee you will do well investing in Israel."

Those confident words were from Pierre Boivin, former president and CEO of the Montreal hockey team, and now president and CEO of Claridge Inc., the private investment firm headed by Stephen Bronfman.

Boivin was speaking at a day-long conference April 29 called "Israel's High-Tech Miracle and Canada: Innovation for Humanity," sponsored by Montreal's Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

That belief in the profitability of Israel's technology sector has led Claridge to return to Israel for the first time in a decade. And the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec, which manages $225 billion in pension funds, is an equal partner.

They have just opened Claridge CDPQ Israel in Tel Aviv, a new firm looking for promising civil technology and innovation ventures, particularly in early-stage companies.

"To say we are bullish is an understatement," said Boivin.

Claridge, established in 1987 by Stephen's father, Charles Bronfman, has not invested in Israel since a major holding, the conglomerate Koor Industries Ltd., was sold in 2006, he said. Claridge previously had large stakes in Teva pharmaceuticals and Osem, the food company.

Doing business in Israel means learning one must penetrate a "rough exterior to find the sweetness inside," Boivin said.

Claridge is impressed that Israel's economy is projected to grow by 4.2 per cent annually until 2019, Boivin said. It also takes into account that over 650 firms, 75 per cent of them foreign, have invested over $2.3 billion (US) in the last two years alone in Israel.

As an example of Israeli high-tech ingenuity, Boivin pointed to Mobileye, a collision-avoidance app, whose shares are now worth 60 per cent more than those of Bombardier, only five years after the company went public.

Prudent fiscal policy, a sound banking system, a resilient economy, and a government that actively promotes innovation and entrepreneurship are all factors feeding that bullishness, he said, and, of course, the discovery of natural gas in Israel.

The "ecosystem" that exists among government, the military, industry and academia has made Israel "the global capital of innovation," according to Boivin.

Israel invests 4.4 per cent of its GDP in research and development annually, the highest rate in the world, which goes a long way to explain the country's 4,000 startups.

"This is a complicated and aggressive region where the 'fight or flight' response is often tested," he said, but that fosters an entrepreneurial and competitive spirit.

As white-hot as the "startup nation" is, Boivin advised growth-equity investors to be patient and not sell too early, as some have in the past.

Patience is something Montreal-based entrepreneur Matthew Price Gallagher, president and CEO of Water Cluster Scientific (WCS), learned. It took him 18 months to negotiate a partnership with Yissum, Hebrew University's technology transfer company, on strategy and ultimately revenue sharing. But he has no regrets five years later.

On the contrary, Gallagher believes Israel, a world leader in nanotechnology, is the best place to develop WCS. Besides, Canadian universities are too "bureaucratic" to enter into such a partnership, he said.

Recently, WCS made a scientific breakthrough in artificial photosynthesis, which has potential applications for solar energy. Gallagher said WCS's experience shows Israel-Canada partnerships are "truly a 1+1=3 proposition."

He's thankful another conference speaker, Dan Vilenski, a member of the Israel National Nanotechnology Initiative, helped him make contacts in Israel.

Canada can learn from Israel in motivating Canadians to be more entrepreneurial, starting in high school, Gallagher thinks.

Our government needs to follow Israel's example in providing "leadership, funding and infrastructure" to encourage innovation. This country has outstanding research and development (R&D) institutions but they lack funding, he said.

"It is embarrassing to me as a Canadian that Canada ranks 19th in terms of overall expenditure on R&D as a percentage of GDP [1.9 per cent], while Israel ranks first." ■

Donation supports Waterloo-Technion research projects

sshefa@thecjn.ca

A $1.6-million donation by the Gerald Schwartz & Heather Reisman Foundation in support of an academic partnership between the University of Waterloo and Technion-Israel Institute of Technology will support a number of ground-breaking research projects in the areas of quantum information science, water, and nanotechnology.

"The donation is in support of our various collaborative research initiatives we have. It will mean a lot more than just providing financial support. It is a huge endorsement to this fantastic collaboration between two world-class universities," said Feridun Hamdullahpur, president and vice-chancellor of the University of Waterloo.

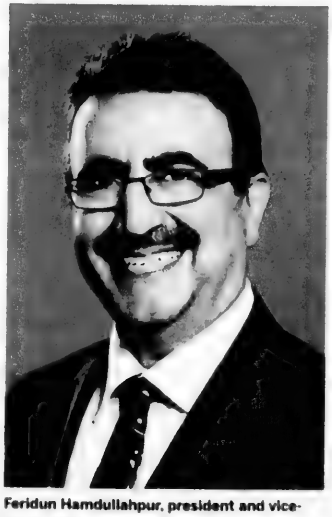
"We have some similar understandings, similar goals and similar objectives as to what we could collectively do to really make a big difference in the discoveries of new knowledge in these areas and to get support from private citizens like Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman means a lot, because they do believe in the nature of a partnership."

One of the projects to come out of the Waterloo-Technion Research Co-operation Program – which was established in 2014 and began with a joint conference in Israel – focuses on the use of nanotechnology to treat lung diseases by carrying medicine directly to the source of the problem. This increases the drugs' effectiveness and minimizes harmful side effects.

The research is a joint project between Waterloo's Prof. Frank Gu of the Waterloo Institute for Nanotechnology and Prof. Josué Sznitman, of Technion's faculty of biomedical engineering and the Russell Berrie Nanotechnology Institute.

Another project, in the field of quantum computing, aims to build a scalable, universal quantum computer, which will be capable of things a regular computer can't do in the areas of database search, machine learning, drug design, information security and more.

Hamdullahpur said that when he discussed with Technion president Peretz Lavie which projects would be best for the two institutions to collaborate on, they agreed that they didn't want to waste a lot of time talking about the partnership.



Feridun Hamdullahpur, president and vice-chancellor of the University of Waterloo.

"We said let's get to it and do the thing that is the absolute right thing to do – put our researchers together – and that's what we did. Within that short year, we ended up with a lot of excellent initiatives, some of which are already producing results right now," Hamdullahpur said.

"The collaboration between the University of Waterloo and the Technion focuses on joint research between Israeli and Canadian scientists in areas crucial to making our world a better place," Lavie said.

"I cannot think of a better partner for such projects than the University of Waterloo, and it is the vision and generosity of Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman that are making this promising partnership a reality."

Hamdullahpur said that while Waterloo has agreements with other Israeli institutions, the partnership with Technion is unique.

"There are some other wonderful institutions in Israel, and hopefully we will be establishing more relationships with them, but right now, focus is very important to us and we have put this collaboration onto a solid platform and we really want to focus there and hopefully we will expand this into other partnerships as we go along." ■

Tel Aviv protest against racism descends into chaos

JUDAH ARI GROSS
TEL AVIV

What began as a peaceful protest turned into bedlam in the heart of Tel Aviv May 3, as demonstrators gathered to protest police brutality and alleged institutional racism against Israel's Ethiopian population.

A video released last week showed a policeman and a police volunteer assaulting an Ethiopian-Israeli soldier in Holon. That footage sparked a demonstration in Jerusalem on April 30, and one in Tel Aviv Sunday, May 3.

At Sunday's demonstration, protesters threw rocks and glass bottles at police, who responded with stun grenades and fired water cannons at protesters.

As of midnight Sunday, almost 50 people had been injured. According to Israel Police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld, 23 of them were police officers.

By the end of the night, 26 protesters had been arrested, he said.

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with Public Security Minister Yitzhak Aharonovitch during the tempestuous protest, and afterward called for order.

"There's room for the clarification of all claims, but there's no room for violence and breaking the law," Netanyahu said. He was to meet leaders of the Ethiopian community May 4, including the soldier who was beaten by police last week.

Sunday's protest began mildly. A few dozen Ethiopian-Israelis and sympathizers gathered at the intersection of Menachem Begin and Eliezer Kaplan streets. The group blocked traffic on Tel Aviv's Ayalon Highway and other roadways, but the protest was non-violent.

Tenat, a nurse at Petach Tikva's Schneider Children's Hospital, sat down in the middle of the intersection. She had just worked a double shift at the hospital and was tired, but felt it was important to come to the demonstration. So she did what she could: she blocked the intersection.

"This is my country, too," she said. "Tomorrow it could be my brothers or my cousins [who are subject to police brutality]."

But as more people arrived at the normally busy intersection, the intensity grew. Police formed a human chain, locking arms to prevent protesters from crossing Menachem Begin eastward to Givat Hatachmoshet Street. Restless demonstrators took that as a challenge.

A protest by thousands of Ethiopian-Israelis and sympathizers against police harassment and brutality turned by nightfall into a chaotic and unusually violent confrontation with the police in the centre of Tel Aviv. RONI SCHUTZER/ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

The two sides pushed up against each other for dominance. Protesters shouted at Israel Police, and then at the Border Police officers who arrived as reinforcements. A female protester broke the tension at 5:45 p.m. when she grabbed a policewoman's hair and pulled. She was swarmed by other officers, handcuffed and escorted away.

After more aimless struggling with police on Givat Hatachmoshet, the protesters eventually made their way west down Kaplan toward Rabin Square, where plans were made for the rally to continue.

With no leadership or organizing committee, the protest lacked focus as the demonstrators arrived at the square in central Tel Aviv.

People chanted in Hebrew, "Violent police officers should be locked up!" and "For blacks and for whites, racism is the devil."

Sometimes it was simpler. "Police state" and "No to racism!" some shouted.

An Ethiopian man in his mid-20s, who identified only as V., stood in the crowd draped in the flag of the Golani Brigade's 13th Battallion. He was a veteran of the 2008's Operation Cast Lead in Gaza.

"We say no to racism," he said. "We say no to violence. We've had it up to here.

"I almost lost my life for the country, and this is how they treat me?"

But while many protesters came with good intentions, there were no speeches planned, no fixed goal. And so, with nothing to do, protesters pushed their way onto the platform overlooking the square. Police quickly and forcefully pushed them back.

In response, protesters threw plastic water bottles at them. Eventually that unrest yielded small scuffles in the parking lot beneath the platform. The mounted police unit arrived on the scene shortly after 8 p.m., causing a stir among the demonstrators.

Police regrouped on the platform above the square, forming another human chain of officers in full riot gear. Protesters pushed and shoved, someone brought a hose from a nearby building and sprayed the police.

At a little after 9 p.m., the first stun grenades were thrown by police. That set off the first of many rounds of escalation, followed by full-blown conflict.

Over and over, police and protesters clashed on the east side of Rabin Square. The two sides would push and shove until someone – from either side – would push too hard. Police would respond by throwing stun grenades. Protesters would respond by throwing bottles and rocks.

Rosenfeld said, "Police did not use force until… protesters threw stones at officers and there was no option but to make arrests."

At 10:55 p.m., police brought water cannon trucks into the square, dousing protesters with a sudsy blue spray. Several protesters were knocked down by the water cannon. Medics from Magen David Adom, who treated demonstrators and police alike, had to brave the water cannons themselves to get to and treat injured protesters.

But there were glimmers of hope in the chaos. A middle-aged Ethiopian man, Gidon, gathered a group of younger people around him. "Violence," he told the group, "we've gotten it. The hardest hits, we've experienced them." That's why he told the surrounding protesters not to pick up a rock, now. "Say no to that violence."

Black and white Israelis struck up dialogue on the outskirts of the square. The Ethiopians tried to explain what they've been through, the white Israelis asked if this violence was really the best way to solve the problem.

There were also low points. A volunteer medic – not a member of Magen David Adom – was helping a wounded protester, whose head and arm were bleeding. As the medic and others gathered to clean the man's wounds and apply bandages, a stun grenade landed in the middle of the group. The volunteer medic fell to the ground.

Two stretchers had to be brought to take away both men.

A protester later shouted at police: "You see that? That's your brother you're doing that to. That's your brother you're putting in jail."

The police were given orders not to respond. "Is it difficult?" an officer asked. "Sure it's difficult. Any more than that I can't say."

Standing over a puddle of blood and broken glass on Malchei Yisrael Street, an Ethiopian man said to the surrounding protesters with a wry laugh, "See, our blood is just like yours."

Yitzhak, a religious Ethiopian man with side-curls and a large white yarmulke, commented, "I feel like we're strangers, like we're not Jews.

"We fight all these wars," he said, "but this is the real war."

While Yitzhak believed that he, as a father, had to come to the demonstration for the sake of his children, he was unconvinced that there would be any discernible effect.

"This protest – there will be more and more of it," said Yitzhak, who like the rest of the protesters refused to provide his last name for fear of legal consequences.

"But in a few days, it will blow over. Then where will we be?" he asked.

The protest began to wind down by midnight, leaving Rabin Square – named for the assassinated prime minister and symbolizing, perhaps, deep schisms in Israeli society – full of broken glass, shards of stun grenades, rocks and burned garbage. ■

How Jewish aid is reaching Nepal

JTA NEW YORK

Almost as soon as news of Nepal's devastating earthquake reached the wider world, Jewish aid groups began mobilizing humanitarian efforts to help the victims.

In Israel, that meant dispatching first responders to Nepal. In North America, it mostly meant raising and allocating money.

How is the Jewish aid being deployed in Nepal?

Israel:
The biggest Jewish on-the-ground response has come from Israel, which currently has more than 260 Israeli soldiers, doctors and rescue experts working in the disaster zone — the largest of all the international aid teams on the ground, according to the Israeli Consulate in New York. The 170-person Israeli Defense Forces delegation has been helping with search and-rescue operations and setting up field hospitals consisting of two operating rooms, four intensive-care rooms, 80 beds and neonatal care.

Magen David Adom, Israel's version of the Red Cross, also sent a group of doctors, paramedics and medical supplies to the country, and rescue and recovery workers from ZAKA and United Hatzalah are in Nepal. The Israeli non-profit Tevel b'Tzedek, which has had a presence in Nepal for eight years, is helping to provide emergency shelter relief and meet other urgent needs.

IsraAid, a 14-year-old Israeli non-profit that focuses on disaster relief work, made headlines on April 30 when its workers helped lead an international aid effort to rescue a woman in her 20s who had been buried in debris since the earthquake hit five days earlier.

Some of the Israeli groups receive American Jewish support – IsraAid, for example, is funded by a few North American Jewish federations, the American Jewish Committee and B'nai B'rith International – but most of the American Jewish money dedicated to Nepal is not going through Israeli groups.

Jewish Federations of North America:
The federation umbrella organization, based in New York, is the central address for the fundraising efforts of individual Jewish federations around North America (donors also can give to the umbrella group directly). Since the Nepal quake, non-federation Jewish institutions such as the Orthodox Union also have appealed to constituents to make Nepal relief donations through the Jewish Federations.

Most of the money raised for humanitarian aid goes to the Jewish Federations' overseas partner organization, the JDC. Totals raised from federations for other recent major disasters overseas included $1 million (all figures US) after the Philippines was struck by Typhoon Haiyan in 2013, $1 million after the 2011 Japanese earthquake and tsunami, $5 million after the 2010 Haiti earthquake and $10 million for the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami.

American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC):
The JDC collects money for special disaster relief appeals from North American federations and individual donors and foundations, and spends it on a variety of needs ranging from the immediate to the long term.

After the Nepal earthquake hit, JDC, which did not have a presence in the country, sent some medical equipment to the IDF field hospital that departed for Nepal last week, including two neonatal incubators. The JDC also sent funds to Magen David Adom to assist the Nepalese Red Cross, to UNICEF to provide emergency supplies for children including water and sanitary materials, and to Tevel B'tzedek to assist with providing shelter.

Meanwhile, the JDC dispatched several staffers to Nepal, including a disaster relief expert who is also a field medic, JDC's India country director and others with experience in disaster relief and work in the developing world.

Typically, JDC disaster relief efforts last for years. For example, of the $2.7 million JDC raised for Philippines relief, as of last September, $1.5 million of it had been allocated along the following lines: 34 per cent on emergency response and relief, 25 per cent on restoring jobs and livelihoods, 15 per cent on disaster risk reduction programs, 14 per cent on rebuilding schools, 11 per cent on psychosocial support and post-trauma care and 1 per cent on public health initiatives.

JDC's disaster relief efforts included $2.8 million after the Japanese earthquake, $8.8 million after the Haiti earthquake and $19.6 million after the Indian Ocean tsunami.

The JDC also co-ordinates the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief, a collection of 49 Jewish agencies that have raised funds for various disasters and in some cases have implemented their own disaster relief programs.

American Jewish World Service (AJWS):
AJWS works in six countries in Asia, but not Nepal. Following this week's earthquake, however, the organization sprung into action, raising $800,000 for Nepal disaster relief in just five days and beginning to distribute the funds to local recipient organizations. AJWS's focus is on rural communities, minorities, women and gays.

To that end, the first round of AJWS grants to Nepal are going to a group providing medical support and earthquake relief to HIV-positive LGBTQ people; an organization that provides free and low-cost medical care to Nepal's most destitute; a group that focuses on health care, education and employment for poor communities in remote mountain villages; and a women's rights organization providing pregnant mothers with shelter and other basic necessities. AJWS is also supporting International Medical Corps' work providing earthquake survivors with first aid and psychosocial support.

AJWS became a major Jewish aid organization after the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami, for which it collected nearly $11 million. It also collected $6.6 million after the Haiti earthquake, $1 million after the Philippines typhoon and over $1 million for Ebola relief. Some of AJWS's money has come from Jewish federations.

Chabad
With outposts around the world, Chabad emissaries often are the first Jews to respond in person to disasters in far-flung places. After the earthquake struck Nepal, Rabbi Chezky Lifshitz of Chabad of Nepal began bringing hygiene supplies, hot meals, fresh water and fruit to Nepalese citizens whose homes had turned to rubble, distributing some 2,000 meals per day, according to Chabad.

The rabbi also borrowed a helicopter to hitch a ride to the mountainous region of Dhunche last week, where some 25 Israeli hikers were stranded and later airlifted out.

The hikers will be sheltered in the Chabad house, which has turned into a crisis hub according to Chabad. The movement is also collecting funds for Nepal earthquake relief. ■

Celebrate Lag b'Omer in Israel – but watch the fire!

Yair Lootsteen

It's Lag b'Omer here in Israel, and I'm reminded of the words of Shai Agnon, Israel's first Nobel Prize laureate, who wrote in the 1950s that "one who has not seen the festivities of Lag b'Omer on the grave of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai in Meron, has never seen true joy."

Lag b'Omer was the last holiday added to the Jewish religious calendar – only in the 12th century. It marks the 33rd day of the counting of the Omer, the period between Passover and Shavuot. Supposedly, on that day millennia ago, a deadly plague that had killed 24,000 of Rabbi Akiva's students finally came to an end.

The holiday is very much an Israeli phenomenon. Growing up in Toronto, I remember learning about it, but I can't recall celebrating or commemorating Lag b'Omer, although I understand that nowadays it's celebrated within Orthodox circles in the Diaspora.

It's a different story here in Israel. Another of those endless dichotomies within Israel society.

To start with – the hiloula, a festive annual celebration at Meron, near Safed in the Galilee. Hundreds of thousands of ultra-Orthodox men and women from all over the country come to commemorate the second-century death of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, one of Rabbi Akiva's disciples, the most noteworthy of the five survivors of the aforementioned plague.

A headache of the first order for police, medical and public transportation services, as well as for other local authorities, the number of visitors grows from year to year. From afar, the hiloula is a huge, raucous balagan. Organized chaos. A celebration of prayer, of dance and of other customs associated only with Lag b'Omer, most notably the traditional halake, when three-year-old boys have their hair cut for the very first time.

It's a different Lag b'Omer for the rest of us. Our Lag b'Omer was crafted by ideologues before Israel's establishment in 1948 and commemorates the Bar Kochba revolt of the Jews against the mighty Romans in second-century Palestine. During Israel's nascent days, that narrative better fit the need for heroic symbols of heightened Zionist awareness. A similar ethos arose around Chanukah and Masada.

Young secular and modern Orthodox Israelis grow up enjoying Lag b'Omer kumzitzes – nightlong bonfires, potatoes and onions thrown in to be discovered and eaten charcoaled late in the night; old-time songs and competitions with "neighbours" for wood and who can keep their fire going and fatigue away, at least until dawn.

In the weeks before Lag b'Omer, kids – my 15-year-old son and his friends have been at it the last couple of weeks – are everywhere collecting wood of all sorts, using supermarket carts and other means and methods to haul their quarry to secret hiding places, awaiting the eve of the holiday.

And every year, thousands of weddings are celebrated on this day, ending 32 days of halachic nuptials prohibitions.

Sounds lovely, wholesome, romantic.

But Lag b'Omer is actually many people's least favourite night of the year.

With literally hundreds of thousands of bonfires alight around the country, the Environment Protection Ministry warns us of "significant increase[s] in particulate matter in the air, which can affect the respiratory system" and of dangers to wildlife and pets, not to mention to humans, on this night. It's definitely firefighters' busiest night of the year.

And don't forget to close every opening of your house and remove all laundry from the lines unless you relish the pervasively smoky scents that will linger everywhere for days. You might as well have been at a bonfire and at least enjoyed the atmosphere.

Whether you're ultra-Orthodox, traditional or plain secular, the way we celebrate or try escaping from Lag b'Omer is just another manifestation of the special, Jewish place Israel is.

Maybe next year, I'll venture to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai's grave in Meron. ■

Film documents Arab/Jewish teens at Ontario camp

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Imagine sharing a room with people from a cultural group that you've grown up mistrusting – and even hating. This kind of living arrangement could naturally generate fear and apprehension.

And it did last summer, when a group of 20 Israeli teenagers – 10 Palestinian Israelis and 10 Jewish Israelis – spent two weeks together at Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont.

They were participants in Heart to Heart, a program founded in 2011 through a partnership between Shomria /Hashomer Hazair Canada and the Givat Haviva Education Institute in Israel. Givat Haviva runs educational programs that promote co-operation and understanding between Jewish and Palestinian Israelis.

The experience of the fourth group of Jewish and Arab teens to go to Shomria was filmed last summer in Heart to Heart, a documentary film, directed and produced by Karen Robbins and edited by Karen Shopsowitz. The film debuted in April at a Heart to Heart fundraiser held at Lula Lounge in Toronto.

The film, focuses on four of the teenagers, a pair of males and females from both the Arab and Jewish groups. In the video, all of them expressed their apprehension at the outset.

"I was really nervous about being in a cabin with Jewish and Arab girls," recalled Sana Zahalka, one of the Palestinian Israeli girls. Towards the end of the film, she said, "At first I wanted it to end quickly. Now I don't want it to end."

Majd Massarwi, one of two Palestinian Israeli males, was worried he might not have anyone to talk to. "I discovered that they [the Israelis] have a lot in common with me," he said.

These sentiments were echoed by the Jewish participants, Nir Sela and Raz Swid. They also conveyed their empathy for the Palestinian political situation. "Everybody says [tells] the history differently," said Sela. "And we need to learn from it …"

Usnat Atamna, a Palestinian Israeli who was one of the chaperones from Givat Haviva, said the camp experience enabled the youths to transcend ethnic barriers "They saw the others as people."

This mutual understanding is the explicit goal of Heart to Heart, according to its executive director, Dalia Krusner. She was interviewed extensively in the film. "To see the transformation these 15-year-olds go through in just over three weeks is just incredible."

Robbins, the director of the documentary, heard about Heart to Heart in 2012 when she was on a trip to Israel.

When she was approached about doing an educational video for Heart to Heart, Robbins agreed to take on the project. It was her first major independent undertaking. "I was doing it as a volunteer. I knew it would just be me, so I was going to have to hone my camera skills."

Much of the film captures the time she spent following the Israeli teens at Shomria. Robbins arrived there after the group's second week, and by then the teens had congealed as a group.

In fact, the connections between them were strong enough to withstand the emotional challenges brought on by the war in Gaza last summer, Robbins recounted. "They actually all cried with each other when they heard the news."

And the group was praised for maintaining this cohesion in a scene filmed at a community party in Toronto. "In the midst of really horrific violence, the 20 of you have managed to come together … Frankly, that's remarkable," Janice Stein told the teens. Stein, founding director of the Monk School of Global Affairs at the University of Toronto, was the featured speaker that evening.

After Robbins reviewed her footage, she asked the award-winning documentary filmmaker, Karen Shopsowitz, to help her edit Heart to Heart.

"I was sold on the project right away," Shopsowitz said at the launch. "Karen's footage was great … It was very important for the kids to tell the story.

"I was so impressed with Heart to Heart … What I like about this program is that they don't shy away from the tough questions." ■

Legendary singer blended jazz with cantorial career

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish Music Week is saluting Moishe Oysher, the cantor who brought jazz to Jewish liturgical music. Also a popular entertainer, Oysher starred in Yiddish movies and Yiddish theatre, performed on Yiddish radio, sang in concert halls and recorded several successful albums.

The Wonderful World of Moishe Oysher is a multi-media show that features Cantor Simon Spiro singing newly arranged selections from Oysher's movies, concert appearances and cantorial and secular albums. Two singers will perform Oysher's well-known nonsense song Haleiva, which he recorded with the Barry Sisters, as part of a tribute to them.

This Jewish Music Week show also includes rare footage, stories about Oysher's life and the 22-piece Moishe Oysher Big Band. Born in Moldova in 1907, Oysher, who was descended from six generations of cantors, had a Canadian connection. In 1921, he was on his way to Winnipeg to join his father when his voice broke. "As a child he was a wonderful boy soprano. His voice came back as a baritone," Spiro said.

Oysher joined a Yiddish theatre company in Winnipeg when his voice came back, then he performed in Montreal's Yiddish theatre. In the late 1920s, he was on Yiddish radio in Philadelphia and eventually he started his own theatre company. Back from a South American tour in the mid-1930s, he had trouble finding work in New York's Yiddish theatre and was offered the position of cantor at the First American-Rumanian Synagogue in the Lower East Side.

"Being a cantor came very late in his career," Spiro said. Oysher was a sensation at the synagogue, which became known as "the cantor's Carnegie Hall." But some members of the congregation balked at the idea of a vaudevillian leading them in prayer and some even revoked their memberships.

To silence the outcry, Oysher made an agreement with the board of rabbis: he would stay off the stage, but he would act in movies and would continue singing on Yiddish radio.

Spiro was 12 when he discovered Oysher on record, on three cantorial albums. Up until then, Spiro, an Elvis fan to this day, "had an aversion to listening to cantors," he said. He added that listening to Oysher, the liturgy "just came alive. On record, his Dayenu blew my head apart on what could be done."

Moishe Oysher

Oysher liked the jazz style of singing and so he brought it to the cantorial liturgy, using similar rhythmic melodies in his prayers. "He was a scatter, the first Jewish scatter," Spiro said. In his day, Oysher was compared to Louis Prima, who was known for his scat singing, but only Oysher "can sing the way he did," Spiro said. "He was able to do these fluid scales because he was brought up in Romania and heard it from the Gypsies."

Oysher, who died in 1958, was one of the first singers to step from the stage to the pulpit. Spiro, Beth Tzedec Congregation's senior cantor, has also balanced dual careers in both cantorial and popular music.

"I led a double life, which Moishe Oysher did," Spiro said. While Spiro performed as one of the regular BBC singers on national weekly radio in his native England, he was also a cantor at the St. John's Wood Synagogue in London, then the seat of the Chief Rabbi of the British Empire.

"We had to keep it quiet for the more stuffy members of the synagogue," Spiro said. Known as the "British Jazz Singer," Spiro worked with Elton John, Faith Hill, Sheena Easton, Johnny Mathis, Kenny Rogers, Cliff Richard and Shania Twain, and he has had hit singles on Israeli and British pop charts. Twice he represented England in the Eurovision finals.

On the cantorial side, Spiro's solo album, Traditional Cantorial and Concert Favorites, is one of the top-selling CDs in the Milken Archive of American Jewish Music catalogue. ■

The Wonderful World of Moishe Oysher will be presented at 7:30 p.m. on May 12 at the St. Lawrence Centre, Jane Mallett Theatre. For more information, visit www.jewishmusicweek.com.

Sons pay tribute to the music of Milton Barnes

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish Music Week opens this year with a tribute to the music of Milton Barnes, including a performance of Harbord Street, a composition that was named for a street in a downtown Toronto neighbourhood that was the heart of the Jewish community until the mid-1950s.

Harpist Erica Goodman, flutist Suzanne Shulman, violist Ivan Ivanovich and accordionist Joseph Macerollo perform at this Mother's Day concert on May 10. The composer's sons, Daniel and Micah, will be on hand to share memories of their father.

Barnes' compositions were inspired by romantic classical music, jazz, popular music and traditional hebraic music. Although those influences can be heard in his works, he viewed himself as continuing the mainstream of classical composition.

He once said that all great composers have drawn their inspiration from the cultural cross-currents of their own time and place.

"Dad was known as a maverick and bohemian," Micah said, because he wasn't musically far out. As a composer, Barnes chose his own path rather than following the lead of the avant-garde composers of the 1950s, who based their music on rhythm, texture and tone colour, instead of the traditional aspects of melody and harmony.

"He consciously stayed away from the avant-garde," Daniel said.

Barnes studied at the Orchestra and Opera Conducting School of the Vienna Academy in 1961, where "they encouraged old-style romantic classicism," Micah said. He added that his father was a renegade who "made music that is vital."

Born in 1931, Barnes began his career as a jazz drummer and guitarist in the 1950s and used the money he earned from playing in dance bands to study composition at the Royal Conservatory of Music. "It wasn't an easy choice for him to become a musician," Daniel said, because his family hoped that he would join the family business.

"His dad ran a successful building company," Daniel added. "After making that choice, he had a need to do something more substantial other than gig around in dance bands."

From 1964 to 1973, Barnes conducted the Toronto Repertory Orchestra, which he founded, and he was music director of the Niagara Symphony and the Niagara Falls Philharmonic. In 1973, he decided to become a composer full time.

Milton Barnes

Barnes was a prolific composer, leaving behind 140 scores, for orchestras, films and television when he died in 2001. "We're cataloguing them for the Canadian Music Centre," Daniel said.

Released in 2001 on the album of the same name, Harbord Street, originally commissioned by Harbord Bakery, evokes memories of downtown Toronto where Barnes grew up.

"Milton really tried to capture what it was like growing up in Toronto as a Jewish kid," Micah said. The era was notable for its anti-Semitism and it was a time when gangs of Jewish and Italian youths roamed the streets. "He had to learn to fight. He had to fight his way to school," Micah said. He added that his dad was always drawn to hebraic themes and "went into his blood for Jewish cultural inspiration" as a composer.

Growing up with a father who Micah said "always had music in his mind and heart," both sons pursued musical careers. Micah, a Juno-nominated singer and songwriter, is a vocal coach who has worked with cast members of the Mirvish production of The Sound Of Music. Daniel, a bandleader, composer and drummer who can be heard backing other musicians on some 40 CDs, has released two CDs of his own and has another one on the way. He plays drums on Micah's latest CD, New York Stories.

Their mother, Lilly Barnes, a poet, novelist and arts journalist, was a scriptwriter for the CBC children's television show, Mr Dressup, for 30 years. Daniel and Micah have another brother, Ariel, who is a cellist with the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra. ■

The Barnes salute takes place at 7:30 p.m on May 10 at the Glenn Gould Studio. For more information about Jewish Music Week, visit www.jewishmusicweek.com.

Photo exhibit centres on the notion of memory

AMY GRIEF

Alan Resnick never considered his late father an artist despite the fact that he was always snapping pictures. Now, Morris Resnick's photographs are featured in Erratics, an exhibition running until June 14 at Toronto's Koffler Gallery.

For Erratics, curator and gallery director Mona Filip brings together two projects centred on the notion of memory: one is by novelist Martha Baillie and the other is a joint effort by artist Malka Greene and Resnick, who's a Gemini award-winning television writer. "I thought it was an interesting parallel to explore with the two projects how much memory and reality inspire fiction and how much fiction and imagination alter memory, or construct memory," says Filip.

Resnick's photographs impressed Filip. "He captured moments and expressions and people with a real photographer's eye," she says. "And it's really wonderful to be able to share these images."

Alan Resnick stumbled upon the cache of photos while rummaging through his parents' condominium locker. He found material from the 1940s and from World War II – his father was a reconnaissance photographer and family lore puts him with "the planes." Resnick knew his dad was the head of the photography club at Hart House while in medical school. At the time, he even won an award, presented to him by the renowned Yousuf Karsh.

Yet, the photos from the locker revealed a whole new side of Resnick, one his son hadn't been privy to before. "When you see your parents in a certain light and now you're kind of being manoeuvred into seeing them in another way, it can be jarring," he says.

He showed the photos to Greene, who eventually compiled 350 of them in an online archive. Since Alan Resnick didn't know what was happening in most of them, Greene filled in the blanks to provide each one with a description. However, this wasn't a random task. Rather, it involved research to ensure historical accuracy. "I'm making it up based on something that to me feels like a truth," she says of the process. "It's not just like oh, that guy is standing on a rock."

Morris Resnick took this in World War II

While wandering through the gallery, it's easy to take the photos and their descriptions at face value. Though, Greene divulges that most of the information is made up. For her, the exhibition explores our relationship to our memories; how they're dually comprised of both fact and fiction.

Meanwhile, Baillie's multimedia project stems from her latest novel The Search For Heinrich Schlögel, about an archivist searching for Heinrich, a young German man who went missing in the Canadian wilderness. It includes a collection of postcards from when Baillie wrote down her manuscript and mailed fragments of it out. The exhibition also includes an audio component and original music by the late composer Nic Gotham.

Filip sees a similar thread between the two parts of Erratics. "One dealt with a real archive that a real person had amassed through his life," she says. "And then the other one, the fictional piece that's based on Martha Baillie's book, dealt with a fictional archivist that is trying to piece together the life and what happened to a fictional character."

While Greene archived the photographs, Alan Resnick wrote textual pieces that appear on the gallery walls. In one, he reflects on his father's role as a reconnaissance photographer. Resnick never thought his dad was in danger during the war; the photographs told a different story. "I grew up believing my Dad was a stay-on-the-base man," writes Resnick. "But when I think about how he lived his life, he was a more fly-in-the-air man."■

Erratics runs until June 14 at the Koffler Gallery, 180 Shaw Street, Toronto.

Theatre trouple tackles Simpsons in post-apocalpytic play

MICHAEL FRAIMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Big Picture Cinema is in terrible shape. The interior of the east-end Toronto theatre is purplish-blue and plastered with gaudy golden frames. The seating is upholstered with dirty turquoise ribbed velvet, and the ceiling paint is peeled off in chunks, revealing off-beige patches.

In short, it looks post-apocalyptic – which is perfect for Mitchell Cushman and Simon Bloom.

"Some spaces have just a ton of potential," says Bloom, who, along with Cushman, is a co-artistic director of the much-acclaimed Outside the March theatre company.

"If you were house hunting, you'd say, 'Oh, that house has a lot of character.' We look for spaces that have a kind of character, that's going to respond to the work that we're doing."

This month, that work is Mr. Burns, a Post-Electric Play.

Mr. Burns debuted in 2012 in Washington, D.C., and tells the story of a dystopian theatre troupe that recreates Simpsons episodes after a global catastrophe. The plays transforms The Simpsons ever deeper from pop culture into genuine mythology by its third act, which takes place decades after the first.

"Whether you've seen each and every episode or have never seen an episode, I think that ultimately there are things that the show riffs on that have much more to do with the energies of our contemporary society."

The play's major conceit is that there is no electricity used at all – everything is gas-lit or battery-powered, all sound effects made in-house.

This is the second play that Cushman and Bloom have co-directed, and the company's eighth since its inception in 2009. Almost all their shows have been site-specific – they can't be picked up and transplanted onto any other stage – and have taken audiences to a kindergarten classroom, a public park, a United church and an actor's mother's house.

"When we were thinking about what space a post-apocalyptic Simpsons play would do well in, we sort of felt this place was kind of perfect," Bloom says.

They use the space well. Actors move fluidly throughout the theatre, down the aisles and up the scaffolding erected onstage. It's easy to bend the script this way, the directors say, because of how ambiguous and challenging the script is.

One such challenge: the musical numbers. At one point, the actors create a car commercial with only their bodies and voices – their arms as windshield wipers, their voices an a cappella soundtrack.

Later, they run through a kinetic series of pop-hit mashups of the last few decades. After rehearsing one that includes a few lines from Gloria Gaynor's I Will Survive, Cushman interjected: "As you keep exploring this, any time you mention survival, treat it like a national anthem. Make it something really patriotic, really unironic."

All this may sound silly, but Cushman and Bloom are aiming for something deeper. On the advice of the playwright, Anne Washburn, they are avoiding easy laughs and keeping the actors serious, even mournful – something they both feel connects them to their Jewish heritage.

"In some ways, this is actually a very Jewish play," Bloom says. "There's a lot of honouring people through memory, and also the development of ritual through the act of remembering that reminds me a lot of the Kaddish."

"It reminds me of being in Yad Vashem and thinking of the way in which the Holocaust is memorialized," Cushman adds. "It's about people who recover from trauma. So in that sense it's universally applicable, but also everyone will see this story through their own lens."

As for non-electrical lighting, the directors will stop short of bringing menorahs into the mix. But Bloom seemed struck with the thought when it came up in conversation. "I wouldn't say there's no menorahs," he said, inviting the idea. "There might be menorahs."

Play runs at Toronto's Historic Aztec Theatre through May. www.outsidethemarch.ca ■

The sweetness of precarious happiness

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There is an achingly poignant, telling moment in Shocking Paris, when Gerda Michaelis Groth – a young refugee who had sought sanctuary in France from Germany's ruling Nazis – recalls the anxious, tense days prior to the outbreak of World War II.

She and the tempestuous, moody painter Chaim Soutine were in love, living in the idyllic, sylvan splendour far south of Paris near Civry-sur-Surein. Gerda was attempting to restore Soutine to full health from severely debilitating stomach ulcers. Through the powerfully recuperative combination of her tender ministrations, fresh country air and the uncluttered, quiet, calm nature of their lives in the green and gold countryside, Soutine started to heal.

"Soutine and I lived from day to day, enjoying the hours that flowed, the pleasure of being together, the sweetness of precarious happiness. [My emphasis] We had willingly abolished our past, and we closed our eyes on the future."

In this one precious nugget of paradox – the sweetness of precarious happiness – Gerda conveys the compressed truth of Stanley Meisler's book.

Meisler has written an instructive, thoughtful book about the group of mostly Jewish immigrant artists who moved to Paris in the early decades of the last century. They and their collective works became known as the School of Paris despite the fact, as Meisler writes, "they were not a school or a movement in the usual sense. They did not try to produce a certain kind of art. Nor can an art historian discern one characteristic or another that defined them. They were simply a phenomenon of history."

It is, of course, this tumultuous and ultimately murderous period of history that lends the touching effect to the phrase: "the sweetness of precarious happiness."

The artists who comprised the School of Paris wildly succeeded in the personal development of their own art and in the advancement of modern painting. But France was not very gracious in accepting them – this dynamic, high-energy group of foreign-born painters. Indeed, it is the reaction of the Parisians to the immigrant artists' success that provides the title to Meisler's book. "The foreign-born immigrant painters in Paris in the 1920s and 1930s made an impact on the history of art before most Parisians realized they were there. When Parisians did realize it, they were shocked that so much of their cherished world of painting was now in the hands of immigrants."

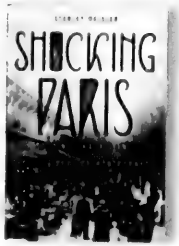
Meisler observes, "the Jewish character of the school of Paris provoked the most puzzlement and comment and rancor in the city." Thus, when the Nazis conquered France in 1940, many of those same Parisians who had expressed resentment over the presence of the foreign-born artists, joined in the sordid effort of ridding the country of these unwelcome immigrants, the mostly Yiddish-speaking, Jewish painters of the School of Paris.

Thus, despite the happiness engendered by their success as artists, they all stood on the edge of a very precarious precipice.

Meisler examines Paris during the period of the first four decades of the 20th century in great detail. This examination takes place on three distinct levels. On the first level, Meisler researches a handful of artists who typified for him the School of Paris: Chaim Soutine, Amedeo Modigliani and Marc Chagall. Meisler reserves the largest treatment for Soutine, because, as we find out in the book's introduction, Soutine was distant family to the author and the magnet that attracted Meisler to writing the story in the first place.

The second level of analysis is a wide-ranging, seminar-like discourse on the School of Paris itself. Some art historians count as many as 77 painters among the group. Meisler focuses primarily, as mentioned, on Soutine, Modigliani and Chagall but also frequently refers to Jules Pascin (Pincas), Moise Kisling, Ossip Zadkine, Jacques Lipchitz, Michel Kikoine, Chana Orloff , Emmanuel Mané-Katz and Pinchus Krémegne. The book is rich in edifying detail about these artists and their exceptionally evocative art.

The third and most compelling level of Meisler's exploration is the constant motif of the artists' outsider status. It courses through the work and culminates in the sorrowful depiction of the fevered efforts by the painters to escape the genocidal grasp of the Nazis and their Vichy accomplices and of the remarkable courage of a few caring others who helped bring about the rescue of some of the artists.



Shocking Paris: Soutine, Chagall and the Outsiders of Montparnasse
Stanley Meisler
(Palgrave MacMillan 2015)

Shocking Paris is an excellent work. It is far more than a literary presentation of the "turmoil, exuberance and pulsating power" of Soutine's paintings, or of the "universal nobility" of Modigliani's subjects or the "deep colours and surreal dreaminess" of Chagall's paintings. At its core, it is a tightly told tale of the flowering of immigrant and especially Jewish immigrant spirit, energy, drive, single-mindedness of purpose and brazen creative power despite an environment that was often hostile and ultimately toxic.

For additional insight into the turbulent Paris of the first half of the 20th century, I recommend Léon Blum, Prime Minister, Socialist, Zionist by Pierre Birnbaum, professor emeritus at the Sorbonne (Yale University Press, 2015).

Fastidiously researched – each page densely loaded with information and anecdotes that are supported by some 40 pages of footnotes – Birnbaum mines the rich veins of myriad archival documents to paint a richly detailed portrait of the remarkable man who stood his principled, moral ground against horrific personal vilification, waves of thuggish political violence, grotesque anti-Jewish hatred, Vichy betrayal and Nazi brutality.

Blum, the improbable prime minister of France in 1936, was the strong-willed and resolute socialist leader of a left-wing coalition of disparate parties. He was a lightning rod for the reactionary forces that would soon transmogrify into the monstrous supporters of Hitlerian fascists and Pétainist collaborators.

Birnbaum paints his portrait of Léon Blum with specifically Jewish brush stokes, time and again highlighting how Blum's Jewish identity was central to all aspects of the man's personality, politics and private and public loyalties. ■

Film fest to end on a delightful note

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After 11 days of programming, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival will end on a high note, with several films destined to make audiences smile and laugh.

The Go-Go Boys and Look at Us Now, Mother! are two hilarious documentaries focusing on fraught family relationships. Meanwhile, Mr. Kaplan, an award-winning comedy from Uruguay, will serve as a delightful dessert when it closes the festival on May 10 at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema.

Film aficionados should not miss The Go-Go Boys: The Inside Story of Cannon Films. The doc tells the story of two cousins, Menahem Golan and Yoram Globus. Golan and Globus were popular Israeli filmmakers who found international success after they moved to Los Angeles in the early 1980s.

Their American studio, Cannon Films, mainly produced films considered to be a schlocky alternative to more reputable mainstream titles. Critics hated them, but audiences in the mood for thrills and vulgarity could not resist the Cannon output.

Filled with sex and violence, these movies were cheap to make yet made a killing at the box office. Some of their biggest hits include Breakin' and Bloodsport, as well as numerous titles with Chuck Norris and Charles Bronson.

Despite the company's fate, watching Globus and Golan recount their biggest successes is a delight. The best part of the doc is at the end, when the cousins sit in a darkened movie house, watching and reacting to their biggest Israeli and American hits.

They earned the nickname "The Go-Go Boys" for the speed they could get a film from the script stage to the big screen. Filled with candid interviews with the titular cousins, the doc about them is suitably fast-paced. It is also a frequently funny flashback to an era of Hollywood rarely seen on the screen.

The Go-Go Boys screens at Empress Walk on May 6 and the ROM Theatre on May 9. (Two of the producers' biggest lewd hits, Lemon Popsicle and The Last American Virgin, also play at the festival.)

Meanwhile, screening on May 8 (at the ROM Theatre) and, more appropriately, on Mother's Day at Empress Walk, is Look at Us Now, Mother! In the film, director Gayle Kirschenbaum explores her difficult relationship with her mother, Mildred. It's a poignant and hilarious doc that should resonate with Jewish mothers and daughters.

Kirschenbaum always found her mom to be mean and highly critical. Mildred, meanwhile, cannot understand why her daughter won't get a nose job or find a husband.

Look at Us Now, Mother! is a therapeutic film of sorts, exploring the misery behind the women's resentment of each other. Kirschenbaum shares painful journal entries from her youth when her mother humiliated her. Mildred also opens up about her difficult childhood and her sadness after her husband of more than 50 years dies.

The dysfunction could have been too much to bear; however, the director finds the right mix between rudeness and tenderness. Mildred has no filter, but although she says some incendiary things that should get big laughs, she has a lot of good things to say about her director daughter.

Although the film loses a bit of focus when it sprawls to examine other family members, anyone watching the doc should be able to relate to some of the stories of family struggle. Look at Us Now, Mother! is a deft blend of sharp comedy and observational drama.

Both the director and her mother will be at the screenings, as well, which should make for a spirited post-film discussion.

Finally, closing night pick Mr. Kaplan – Uruguay's submission for the foreign language film Oscar – should send audiences home happy. Filled with comic energy due to its sly parodies of spy flicks, it tells the story of Jacob Kaplan (Héctor Noguera), a Jewish man struggling to cope with old age.

When Kaplan hears about a Nazi hiding in South America, he makes it his personal mission to find the war criminal and bring him to Israel to be tried in court. To help him with this task is Wilson Contreras (Néstor Guzzini), Kaplan's bumbling driver who used to be a police officer.

The two men make for an inspired comic pairing and the film often moves in unpredictable directions as Kaplan comes ever closer to capturing the shifty Julius Reich. Writer/director Álvaro Brechner has a knack for creating memorable comedy set-pieces, including a suspenseful scene on a diving board (as Kaplan cannot swim) and a dizzying dream sequence.

It doesn't boast a lot of slapstick, but there are some cheeky sight gags and deadpan reaction shots, as well as much witty banter between Noguera and Guzzini. Gorgeously lensed and terrifically acted, Mr. Kaplan is a wonderful film about second chances. ■

GUEST VOICE

Look at us now

Gayle Kirschenbaum

I was convinced I was adopted. I couldn't understand why my two older brothers were being treated so differently from me.

Once I realized I was not adopted, I had to figure out what was going on. I knew that I didn't do anything wrong – I was just born a female to a mother expecting a boy. But for mom, there was never anything right about me – my nose was too big, my hair too curly, my body too fat (even though I was quite thin). Humiliation was her specialty.

I tried to hide in my room and escape into my diaries, where I wrote and drew. Even those were found and read by mom. I lived filled in fear, never knowing what might trigger mom's rage toward me.

I went to university – 320 kilometres away – so I no longer had to live in what felt like enemy territory. My friends became my family, and all the things I had been criticized for, I was now complimented on.

My confidence started building, and soon I found my path in life. However, I still struggled with my relationship with my mother. I knew, for my own mental and physical health, I needed to find a way to forgive her. I knew I had to render her abuse powerless over me, but I was still seething with anger and resentment. All I wanted to do was get away, nurse my wounds and wallow in being a victim.

I started searching for answers, delving into mom's past to find out what happened to her as a child. Mom's response was always, "I don't know. I don't remember." I kept digging.

I also agreed to visit a plastic surgeon, as long as she let me bring a film crew. I ended up making a funny short film, My Nose, about my mother's relentless campaign to get me to "bob my schnoz." I was overwhelmed by the reaction to this little film, and I started hearing other people's stories. I knew I was not alone.

I was on a mission to heal my relationship with mom and record the journey for personal purposes. Mom agreed. As I started to understand her better and we grew closer, I knew I was tapped to make an in-depth film about the (hopeful) transformation of my relationship with her from loathing to love. I had no idea how hard it would be to make.

> I was on a mission to heal my relationship with mom and record the journey.

With the help of professional therapists, mom began to open up, and I researched what she did not remember, finding answers through archival records and newly discovered family members. As family secrets were uncovered, mom revealed a childhood filled with tragedy and struggle – attempted suicides, financial hardships and untimely deaths.

Armed with this knowledge, I was able to change how I looked at her. I stopped expecting her to love and adore me, and starting looking at her as a wounded child.

Today we are extremely close. Since dad died, we have become each other's preferred travel companions. I feel lucky to have gotten to this place in my relationship with her and can treasure and enjoy our remaining time together. Judaism teaches us that every descent is for the sake of an ascent. If it weren't for my difficult childhood, I would not have had the opportunity to grow. I am forever grateful for the obstacles I have faced; they provided me with a chance to learn. The greatest lesson I have learned is the ability to forgive, which is the biggest gift you can give to yourself. ■

Gayle Kirschenbaum's film Look at Us Now, Mother! screens May 8 at the Royal Ontario Museum and May 10 at the Cineplex Cinemas Empress Walk 6 as part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Testing friendships

Ella Burakowski
ella@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

My close friend Cindy has no sense when it comes to money. Cindy is the type of gal who has to have everything – the latest trendy outfit, pair of shoes, car. She has her nails done every week and is forever going to her masseuse. The problem is that Cindy has no money! She lives off some money her parents left her, but that will soon be gone. She has no savings, no RRSPs, no real estate. Her car is leased, her condo is rented and her credit cards are maxed out.

She has come to me for a loan from time to time, and I have always managed to weasel out of giving it to her. I feel like I'm standing by and watching my friend self-destruct. At this rate she is going to end up homeless. How do I get through to her?

Lousy Money Manager

Dear Lousy Money Manager

Cindy may be spending to fill a void. This excessive spending behaviour is no different than any other addiction. It is labelled compulsive buying disorder, or oniomania.

If you are prepared to get involved, you must call her out on what you see and not let her make excuses for her actions. Are you prepared to take her by the hand and lead her through the steps she will have to go through?

Like any other addiction, Cindy has to admit she is in trouble. This will be the hardest part of the entire journey. Let her know what you have noticed and try to scare her into reality. Be honest and tell her why you will not lend her money. If she is willing to disclose her financial situation, you can show her on paper how she is setting herself up for a disaster.

If you can get through this first step, you can move on to a more positive solution. Help Cindy come up with a budget. Write down every expense she has and every bit of money she has to work with. See if she is willing to be accountable for her spending. If all else fails, CAMH has programs for this type of addiction. It may be a good place to get ideas on how to help Cindy.

Don't be surprised if Cindy is not willing to listen just yet, but feel good knowing that at least you've planted the seed of concern in her mind. Let her know you will be there, when she comes to terms with the fact that she needs help.

Dear Ella,

I'm part of a close circle of friends. Janice, one of my dearest friends, broke up with Josh more than a year ago, but they remained close, and he has become an important member of this circle.

A couple of months ago, Josh's mom passed away. Since then, Josh and I have become closer. I lost my mother last year, and this common grief has bonded the two of us. It is obvious that Josh and I are headed into a relationship that will extend the boundaries of "just friends." I have no idea how Janice is going to feel about this, and I love her dearly and do not want to hurt her. I also do not want to give up on what Josh and I have developed. I'm stuck and scared. Help!

Testing Loyalty

Dear Testing Loyalty

Dating your friend's ex falls in the category of the "dating grey zone," and there are no easy answers. This situation is a little different, because Josh and Janice were mature enough to put their breakup behind them and continue on with their friendship. Often a relationship will end badly, and hard feelings and anger are left behind.

Don't let Janice discover this through the grapevine. You must be upfront with both Janice and Josh. Be honest with Janice. Explain how innocently your bond developed. Hopefully enough time has passed that Janice will be onside, but you have to prepare yourself for the chance that she will not approve. In that case, you will have some hard decisions ahead of you. Even if Janice gives you her blessing, the dynamic of your relationship could change.

Often, the best relationships are created when the two people involved start out as friends first. Friendship is about honesty, loyalty, support and respect. Your circle of friends has already tested some difficult situations and has come out on top. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

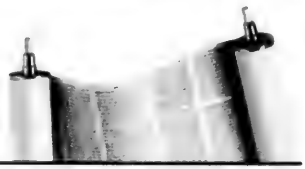
Parshah

Emor | Leviticus 21:1 - 24:23



Rabbi Ilan Acoca recalls Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai on the occasion of his Yom Hiloula
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explores the ritual and tradition of counting the Omer
Rabbi Catharine Clark says we must never forget our obligation to care for the poor

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The weekly parshah starts with God commanding Moses: "Say to the kohanim and tell them" (Leviticus, 21:1)

Rashi points out that God used the terms "say" and "tell," thus commanding Moses to transmit the message to the adult kohanim, who in turn were supposed to transmit it to the younger kohanim.

The idea of passing the message on is one of the most important teachings of Judaism. Without it, Judaism would cease to exist.

One classic example is the Shema paragraph, where it says "You should teach them to your children." (Deuteronomy, 6:7).

This week, we are celebrating Lag b'Omer, the Hiloula of the anniversary of the death of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai (Rashbi), who, according to many opinions, is the author of the Zohar.

Why would we celebrate the anniversary of his death?

Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai referred to this day as Yom Simchato ("the day of his happiness") and a spiritual wedding because the Rashbi knew that after his death, he would be under the marriage canopy with God and Am Yisrael would embrace the teachings of the Zohar so dearly as if they were married to it.

And it all started with the Rashbi transmitting the teachings of the Zohar to his disciples, eventually leading to the printing of the Zohar in 1558.

The Rashbi was the first tzaddik whose Yom Hiloula was celebrated.

In the Sephardi tradition, a Yom Hiloula is commemorated specifically with joy and festive celebration. According to Kabbalah, on the yahrtzeit of a tzaddik, all the spiritual redemption of his life shines into this world, contributing to the messianic redemption and bringing spiritual blessing to all who are connected to him.

May the merit of the Rashbi and the teachings he transmitted shine upon us, and may we able to transmit the message to the next generation. Amen! ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

The Torah reading, Emor, includes in it the commandment of Omer: "You shall bring a sheaf [omer] of the first fruits of your harvest unto the priest. And he shall wave the sheaf before the Eternal for your acceptance." The Torah also mandates that "you shall count for yourselves from the morrow after the Shabbat from the day that you brought the sheaf of the wave-offering; seven complete Sabbaths, until, on day 50, the Festival of Shavuot is marked."

This count, from the day after the day of rest of Passover, begins a seven-week period that serves as an agricultural bridge from the barley harvest of early spring to the wheat ("first fruit") harvest celebrated in early summer, at Shavuot.

There was an ancient debate about this counting and about the sacred calendar. According to the Book of Jubilees, the Omer count began on Sunday, following the Shabbat day of rest, as part of a 364-day solar year. Because 364 is divisible by seven, each of the festivals would occur on fixed days of the week. This tradition was also associated with the Baitusim (Essenes?), a group mentioned in the Talmud and the Qumran community.

In contrast, the rabbinic tradition (also preserved in the Greek translation of the Bible) maintained that the calendar followed the lunar cycle in a complex interplay with the solar year and that the counting began on the second day of Passover, which follows the festival rest day. By counting from the second day of Passover, the 49-day period directly links Passover and the Exodus to the date of the giving of the Torah, a day mentioned in the Torah and eventually associated with Shavuot.

Not only do traditional Jews verbally articulate (emor) a ritual counting count each night of the sheaf-omer period, the sheaf-waving (omer) comes to be linked to a belief in an oral tradition (emor) about the revelation of Torah on Shavuot. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

Parshat Emor reviews the Jewish calendar, telling us which holidays to celebrate when and with which customs. The passage hits all the highlights of the Jewish year, including Shabbat, Passover, Shavuot, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot, in this order.

One odd detail of the text is the insertion of agricultural instructions between Shavuot and Rosh Hashanah. We are warned against reaping all the way to the edges of our fields and against gathering the gleanings of our harvests. Rather, we should leave this produce for the poor and the stranger.

The commentators rightly wonder why our obligations to the poor are recited in the midst of instructions about the holidays. Rashi writes that the Torah's ordering of the text teaches us how commendable it is to leave food for the poor. According to him, for one who fulfils the commandment to leave the corners and gleanings of the field, it is as if he had built the Temple and brought his offerings there to be sacrificed. Supplying food for the poor is the same as making pilgrimage, a powerful mitzvah.

Nehama Leibowitz suggests an alternative explanation. Citing earlier commentaries from the Bechor Shor and Ibn Ezra, she observes that Passover and Shavuot coincide with the harvest season. The rules benefiting the poor are recited here to counteract the natural human tendency to forget the needs of others as we enjoy our bounty.

I propose one more explanation. We look forward to each holiday and celebrate it with joy. We put so much thought into planning for the holidays, considering guest lists and menus well in advance. So too we should approach our obligations to care for the poor. Parshat Emor teaches us to give with joy and to plan our budgets so that they include ample donations made wisely. ■

Rabbi Steven Wernick: Shuls need to provide meaning

LILA SARICK

Rabbi Steven Wernick, CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), was in Toronto last month as part of a cross-country tour visiting Canadian synagogues. He sat down to discuss the challenges facing the movement and its future.

What do you hear from Canadian congregations?

It's concern about the future and what are the things we should be focusing on. There's a clear understanding of many of the challenges that we face in terms of literacy, living in an open society, assimilation, intermarriage and so forth. There's an understanding that the business model of synagogues has radically changed.

What do you mean the business model has changed?

A membership model is based on a transactional relationship and it's based on certain assumptions of affiliation that can no longer be made. Synagogues used to have a monopoly on education. If you wanted Jewish learning, you had to be part of a synagogue. They no longer have that monopoly. People go to Wikipedia. Synagogues used to have a monopoly on life-cycle events. They no longer have a monopoly. You can get a life-cycle event done practically anywhere.

So the fundamental purpose of sacred community has to be re-imagined for the needs of individuals today. We need to focus more on Torah as wisdom for leading a meaningful life, as the primary reason why we cluster in communities, because that Torah is most powerfully felt in relation to other beings that share a commitment to each other, to God, Torah, and to Israel, the Jewish People and the Land of Israel.

Rather than asking "How can I get more members in," I think the core question synagogues have to ask is "How can I get more meaning out?"

The change today is if you only worry about membership, you're not going to get the money or the members. You have to worry about meaning and about how you can understand people's self-interest, their values, their stories, and organize around what those interests are through a Jewish lens. If you do that, then you build a financial model around it, which is the reverse of what tends to happen today.

Rabbi Steven Wernick

In Toronto, a number of shuls have left the USCJ. What is the argument for them to rejoin the movement?

United Synagogue has really heard, understood and internalized the need for change and has successfully transformed itself into a new organization. If you want to have a seat at the table that shapes the [ideological] centre and the future of the centre, United Synagogue is the platform that makes that table possible.

The synagogue has been the most successful institution for the mass transmittal of Jewish identity for the last 2,000 years. There's nothing on the horizon that looks like it's going to take its place.

United Synagogue creates the platform for congregations that share a worldview can come together to discuss, share, and co-create the future. If you look at the work United Synagogue does, by virtue of the fact it's the largest constituent body for Conservative Judaism in the world, our engagement with Ottawa, our engagement with Washington, our engagement with Jerusalem, we're invited to participate in those conversations because we're viewed as representing that body. So if you want to have influence, you need to be at the table.

Looking at challenges facing synagogues, how can they change?

Those synagogues that are understanding the status quo is not sustainable are making changes. What does it really mean to be relational? Obviously you do programs, but what are the values that underpin the programs you create? What does success look like?

If you value Torah learning as a transformative experience, then are you asking people what are their concerns in the world and the way in which they can be transformed. Same thing about prayer.

It's not that there are any easy fixes for this, and it's not like there's a program bank like we used to have.

What does success look like?

It looks like having a deep understanding of who are the people in your community. Many synagogues will do the ceremonial pre-Rosh Hashanah phone call, where the board will call shul members, and everybody's excited that no one's asking for money, they're just saying "Good yontif."

If we were to really become a relational synagogue, the questions are different. You want to know what gets people up in the morning and keeps them up at night. Then you create activities in response to what people are thinking about. It has staffing implications – not only how much staff do you have, but what are the jobs of the staff?

That's not to say casino nights or social programs are unimportant. But it is to say that the job of the leadership is not to micro-manage that type of activity. The job of the leadership is to say if we care about Torah and tfillah, if we care about Israel, what are the ways that we leverage our resources to accomplish that?

Synagogues are going to need an endowment that generates 20 per cent of their operational income or they're not going to be sustainable. And they're going to need to create that within the next 15 years.

Why is this so crucial for synagogues?

We have a heavy investment in real estate that's becoming more and more expensive to maintain. Fixed costs like staffing and electricity are going up and the amount of money a Jewish family is able and prepared to spend annually has just about topped out. There's not much higher you can go in terms of what you charge for dues, so you have to build the endowment. Plus, we know the assumptions for millennials to join are different than the assumptions of baby boomers and current retirees.

How will the Conservative movement look in 10 to 15 years?

There's going to continue to be some more contraction, but I think the engagement and commitment levels are going to go up.

I hope synagogues will come to understand that the conversation with millennials, Jewish adults in their 20s and 30s, is not how can we engage you but can we help you engage us? That engagement might not happen in the synagogue. It might have to be something the synagogues supports in urban areas where Jewish adults in their 20s and 30s live.

My vision would be that we actually align what we profess with what we do, that we're more concerned about Judaism as a means for refining the human condition than we are about boundaries, that we don't measure success by how many observances a person has but how a person uses observance to improve the human condition. And that our synagogues understand that success can't be just looking internally and asking "How do I drive members to my shul?" but "How do I drive my shul to making meaning within the lives of my members and the community in which we live?" That would be really exciting. ■

'Holy War': The Montreal rabbis' walkout of 1935

Backstory

IRA ROBINSON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the 1920s, Montreal Jews established the Vaad Ha'ir (VH) to exercise control over kashrut and subsidize Jewish educational institutions. Montreal's Orthodox rabbinate simultaneously organized as the Vaad Harabbonim (VR). VR enabled a number of immigrant Orthodox rabbis to earn a relatively decent living supervising kashrut.

By 1935, however, the Depression was taking its toll. The previous December, VH reported a deficit of $10,000. This resulted in pressure to economize by either cutting rabbis' salaries or the subsidies VH was paying to educational institutions whose teachers had not been paid in months. VH proposed a 15 to 20 per cent reduction in rabbinical salaries in January, 1935.

In February, all but one of the VR rabbis staged a walkout. VH tried to continue without them, claiming that it still controlled kashrut even though only one of the eight original VR rabbis was still on the job. The seven strikers – including VR's chair and vice-chair Rabbi Hirsch Cohen and Rabbi Yudel Rosenberg – continued to regard themselves as the legitimate VR and warned that in VH slaughterhouses errors in kashrut were now very likely.

The press, using standard labour terminology, spoke of the rabbis having "downed their tools." VH charged the rabbis with walking out for no reason and with no warning. Rabbi Cohen argued that the rabbis had walked out because VH was concerned only with issues of kashrut and not with other communal issues.

Not so, retorted the VH. They had argued for years that it wanted its rabbis to fulfill functions other than kashrut, including visiting hospitals and schools, and that it was the rabbis who had balked at the extra work. VH charged that the rabbis had walked out because VH continued to support the schools at the expense of their salaries. In response, Rabbi Cohen cited Shakespeare: "the devil can quote scripture." He pleaded for a non-partisan committee to hear the rabbis' complaints.

In March the dispute ratcheted up a notch. VH publicly claimed to employ 11 slaughterers, 10 supervisors and to be supervising 67 butcher shops. More significantly, it claimed that its rabbis constituted the only legitimate VR. In response, the dissident rabbis formed a new Va'ad Hakashrut (VK).

At this point one of the major fault lines in the rabbinical walkout became publicly visible. At its inception, VH had been purposefully constituted so as to be inclusive of the "radical" non-Orthodox Jewish community and to undertake to support both the religiously-oriented education of the Talmud Torah and the "radical" Folks and Peretz Shules. The fact that Rabbi Cohen wished to give VK's support only to the Talmud Torah indicates that he wanted no part in this inclusive coalition. Rabbi Cohen and his colleagues likely saw in this crisis an opportunity to create a strictly Orthodox VK. The rabbinical strike had now become a "holy war."

By April, both sides were looking for a way out of the impasse. VH could not indefinitely dispense with the services of the most important Orthodox rabbis of the city. The strikers, for their part, failed to get a recognized communal leader to head a VK that worked specifically for their religious interests and that doomed their effort to failure.

A break in the conflict came about a month later, when Rabbi Rosenberg and two colleagues asked to be reinstated in VH and were accepted back. Rabbi Rosenberg called for the remaining dissidents to return as well, stating that no one profited from this communal division except Satan.

Through the summer of 1935, the newly reconstituted VR functioned with five members, while four rabbis remained for the moment on the outside. But on Oct. 17, the leading holdout, Rabbi Hirsch Cohen, once again publicly took his place as chair of VR. By the annual meeting of the VH in December 1935, affairs had returned to a semblance of "normalcy".

The Montreal rabbinical walkout of February to October 1935 highlighted the changing role of the Orthodox rabbinate. It also exposed tensions within the community between Orthodox and "radical" Jews that would ultimately result in the evolution of VH into a decidedly Orthodox institution with hardly a memory of its initial inclusive mandate. ■

Get away to your own garden

A shady space in your yard, especially one that provides an escape from late afternoon sun, can be the perfect cooling and calming getaway spot. Combining shade-loving perennials and annuals in a subtly contrasting mix of shape, texture and colour assures beauty and restfulness in this peaceful retreat.

"Take a look at the PC hosta called Cool as a Cucumber for example," says Peter Cantley, gardening expert for President's Choice brand. "This plant features long, tapered leaves with bright green margins and white centres. The name itself invokes calm, cool feelings – and this hosta is ideal for areas with minimal sun exposure."

Keep the final height and width of your chosen plants in mind when placing them in the garden. Taller plants should be placed near the back of border gardens or at the center of island-style gardens. Make sure to arrange your selections in clusters of three to five plants of each variety for the most eye-appealing end result.

The size of your garden area and the individual space requirements of each type of plant you choose will determine how many plants are needed. Check individual plant tags for the correct spacing and the size of maturity to help you decide.

> Pair the soothing sounds of a fountain with a hammock

To really accentuate the calming atmosphere, think about adding a small water feature. Pair the soothing sounds of a fountain with a hammock plus your favourite book and your shaded area will be a perfect little summer oasis. ■

How smart are the new Smart Home gadgets?

A thermostat that programs itself based on your schedule. A light bulb that transitions from hard to soft light depending on the time of day…A smoke alarm that texts you when there's a problem. Smart Home gadgets are on the rise, and there are plenty to choose from this year. The folks at Home Guru Inc. demystify some of the new technology and help us figure out how to get the best smart home for the best value.

The sum is greater than its parts

Tempting as it is to grab these products when we see them, we should be wary of trying to piece together makeshift systems from individual products at big box stores. When you try to do home automation yourself, you're missing out on the magic of what home automation can be. Going the piecemeal route to your smart home is the biggest mistake many buyers make. Often, they end up with a system that is not cohesive, which can cost more in the long run trying to make it right.

Saving money with home automation

Save money by using a professional to program and install a system that is customized to your needs. You'll get the benefits of the best energy savings for your lighting, heating and cooling systems and you'll have problem-free installation and usability.

The pros know which products work best for a retrofit versus a new home. They know which components will last longest with fewer repairs and more room for upgrades, and they can program everything to be accessible from your mobile device or computer, instead of having a different remote for each component.

A cohesive lighting, heating and cooling system will reduce energy bills by self-adjusting when nobody is home, and you can use Shabbat packages for worry-free Shabbats with no planning, or forgetting, or having the worry of kitchen fires from appliances left on. Use your smartphone to turn up your heat and water heater when you're on your way home from vacation. Schedule your air conditioner by your work hours or set your door locks to turn on lights, music or fireplace when you arrive home.

Security, control, and peace of mind

Our biggest investment is our home. Using the right technology, we now have the ability to protect and manage that investment in a way we never could before. A smart home can help keep homes, pets and loved ones safe in the event of a fire, flood or break-in.

Imagine being able to remotely check on your home while you're away, and setting your furnace to shut down air circulation if a fire starts. This will prevent it from spreading while you and the authorities are notified. Your outside lights will flash to allow emergency crews to find your house quickly and alert neighbours to the problem.

You can set your main water valve to shut off as soon as a flood is detected to prevent excessive damage, or make it look like you're home with a program that changes up your lighting patterns, and opens and closes your blinds while you're away.

A smarter home today means money saved and a mind at ease, and with exciting new technology being introduced for 2015, the possibilities are truly endless. ■

How to revitalize your home with high-impact results

Spring is the time of year when we breathe a collective sigh of relief that winter has finally released its icy grip. That is, until we realize it's time to tackle a full season (or two) of collective grime. While some of us might consider crocuses and red-bellied robins to be a sure sign of spring, unofficially, it can just as well be heralded in by the run on cleaning supplies and the steady hum of a vacuum cleaner.

So, when everything in a home looks like it's ready for a refresh, where does one start? If you want to make the greatest dent, tackle these high-impact areas first:

Dusting

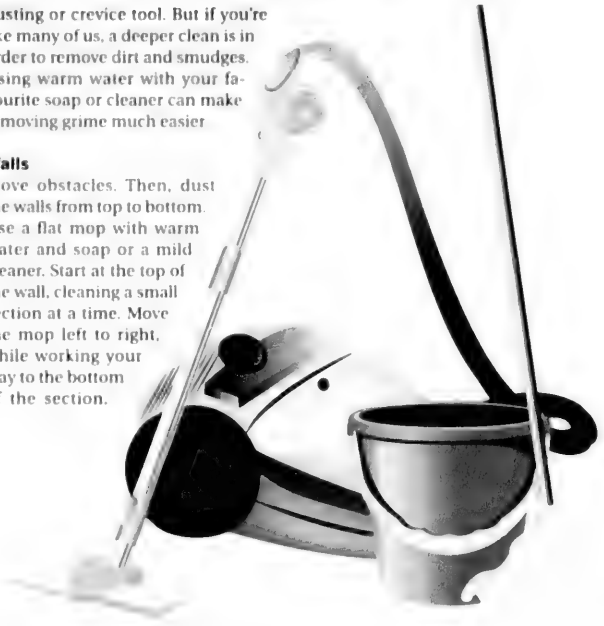
Dust settles everywhere, and cleaning every surface and object can get really tedious. So why not save some time and energy? Your secret weapon – your vacuum and its trusty soft dusting tool – will help you to tackle just about any surface and get the job done in half the time.

Baseboards and door frames

If you've been pretty good about upkeep, your baseboards and door frames may just need a quick swipe with your vacuum's dusting or crevice tool. But if you're like many of us, a deeper clean is in order to remove dirt and smudges. Using warm water with your favourite soap or cleaner can make removing grime much easier.

Walls

Move obstacles. Then, dust the walls from top to bottom. Use a flat mop with warm water and soap or a mild cleaner. Start at the top of the wall, cleaning a small section at a time. Move the mop left to right, while working your way to the bottom of the section.



Dry the wall with a clean towel. Repeat, completing one section at a time, until you reach the end of the wall.

Carpet/hardwood floors

Winter is hard on flooring, but so is the spring melt. Even with the greatest care, somehow the outdoors has made its way indoors. A deep clean is the simplest way to revitalize tired flooring. Experts like Hoover suggest using a vacuum that can get the job done effortlessly. At the top of the list this year is the Hoover Air Cordless. It offers constant, powerful suction with the ability to tackle multiple surfaces. This expert also recommends making multiple passes for the most effective clean. Washing floors thoroughly and regularly with a multi-surface deep cleaner will extend the life of your floors and help your home shine. In fact, you can simplify the job with a versatile unit like the Hoover Max Extract, which can wash hard and soft floors, as well as upholstery.

Now with the big stuff out of the way, you can focus on the little things – like a mani-pedi to reward all that hard work. ■

Modern stained glass windows at AM Studio Toronto

From the heart of the Galilee in Israel to the heart of the design and décor district in Toronto, AM Studio, acclaimed stained glass artists, bring a wealth of talent and experience to any project they tackle.

The team of glass artists are from the well-known Israeli art glass studio, Andreas Meyer, in Nahariya. Since 1967, they have crafted stained glass windows and other glass objects in Israel and all over the world.

Giora Meyer, a co-founder of AM Studios, managed the Andreas Meyer glass studio for over 20 years. Upon moving to Canada, Giora saw an opportunity to introduce many of the same artisan and unique glass technologies to the North American market.

In 2007, together with Orly Meyer, he opened AM Studio in Toronto. As a team, they look to serve the trade and public with their first custom lighting showroom and glass studio.

They have carried commissioned work around the world, using a variety of creative techniques and designs including stained glass and contemporary fused stained glass. Their projects in Canada include Shomrai Shabbos Chevrah Mishnayos Congregation, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Jacob Hamilton and other commercial and residential projects.

In addition to stained glass work, AM Studio has expanded to custom lighting and has been showcasing their fused glass light fixtures to the local and international market in Toronto. ■

Quick tips for home rejuvenation

Preparing your home for summer involves just as much planning and organization as switching your wardrobe before the warmer months arrive. Don't let yourself get overwhelmed because you've waited too long to begin, no matter whether it's finding a swimsuit or buying an air conditioner.

Here's a helpful guideline:

Bring the air conditioner out of storage or uncover your outside unit and hose down the coils. Wash the filters – blocked air filters create a drag on an air conditioner's ability to push and pull air through air registers. After washing, turn it on. If it doesn't work at every temperature and fan range possible, call a professional to see if it can be fixed. If you must replace it, act soon while the selection is greatest. Before inviting a handyman to install your unit, clear areas around it so that it has strong air flow, and, if there's space, consider planting a tree outside the window to provide shade, another aid in running air conditioners efficiently.

Carefully inspect all lamps and appliances you plan on using throughout the season – refrigerator, washer and dryer, dishwasher, blender, coffee and ice cream makers – for functionality, cleanliness and faulty wiring.

Clean the windows' interiors and exteriors. At the same time, look for cracks or damage to windows and weather-stripping, which might need a boost or total redo. Take down the storm windows if you have them, and replace them with screens – checking for tears and washing them first.

When it comes to the window dressings, consider shades that help reduce energy loss through the windows so your air conditioner won't have to work so hard.

Have your own pool? Bring in a professional to inspect it thoroughly, including both the visible, like cracks and stains, and more mechanical aspects, such as pump and filter, chlorine content, diving boards and safety rails, and make any necessary repairs. The same goes for hot tubs, barbecues and lounge furniture – maybe a good cleaning or new cushions are in order.

If it works with the design, remove rugs and show off shiny hardwoods, which not only keep the room cooler, but are easier to keep clean. Bring out your entertaining supplies – table and bed linens, beach towels and toys, hammock and picnic basket. Make sure no moths have done their damage or mold has grown over the winter, that there is enough of everything, and that all are in top-notch condition. Prepare the fireplace for cool evenings and stockpile logs. Shore up a supply of energy-efficient light bulbs as well as candles, which will come in handy for dinner parties and electrical outages, a hazard of summer storms.

Anything can happen anytime, anywhere, so keep contact information for qualified service professionals in your area handy. It's always good to have phone numbers for a plumber, an electrician, heating and air conditioning services, and a general handyman.

With these tips, a great summer is just around the corner. ■

Add trendy updates to your outdoor space

If you would like to put some new life into your patio this year and are curious about the latest outdoor living trends, take a look at a few tips from Cindy Jardim, a home furnishings expert at Lowe's Canada. She is at the forefront of what's hot in décor and design.

"When it comes to your outdoor spaces, décor should be an extension of your indoor design sensibilities," explains Jardim. "The same principles that apply inside like spacing, scale and accessorizing should be used to enhance an outdoor space."

Here are her top three outdoor living principles for 2015.

Conversation sets: Homeowners are moving away from traditional dining sets and choosing furniture that encourages people to kick-back and linger. Need space to eat? Group together multiple coffee tables with your conversation set to create a relaxing and casual environment.

Innovative outdoor cooking: Escape your kitchen and enjoy the outdoors. Outdoor kitchens are big this year. And no, we're not just talking about burgers on the barbecue – from pizza to rib roast you can buy accessories to cook literally anything outside these days.

Backyard smokers are gaining momentum in Canada and barbecue options go way beyond just gas, charcoal, and electric. Choose the grill size that best suits your lifestyle. For example, those who like to entertain might opt for a party-sized unit and empty nesters or singles living in the city, might choose a smaller-sized electric grill. There's something for everyone.

Small space décor: Just because you have a small outdoor space, like a condo balcony, doesn't mean you can't enjoy it. Take back your space with privacy screens and use space-saving, double-duty furniture to maximize square footage. Outdoor flooring can also go a long way to elevate your space, making a concrete balcony more welcoming and comfortable.

Bonus tip: Are you tired of spending your precious summer weekends and evenings mowing the lawn or setting up sprinklers? Consider laying artificial grass. With a product called SYNLawn, you'll use up to 70 per cent less water and it looks great. ■

Home décor enthusiast heeds Mother Nature's recipe

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

American author/textile designer Susan Hable, co founder of Hable Construction, is a colour expert affiliated with the Color Association of the United States. Hence, when this design guru relocated from New York City to Athens, Ga., she assumed decorating her new home would be a snap.

However, Hable was overwhelmed by the creative challenge until taking a tip from Mother Nature. While exploring her new neighbourhood, the astute artist suddenly realized nature had paved the way.

She observed multi-hued blooms, feathers, flowers and foliage, and marvelled at the effect of natural light on the colourful landscape. Buoyed with enthusiasm, Hable applied nature's ready-made palette to create colourful settings in furnishing her home. She also did her homework by visiting other homes and public buildings, and she culled mementos from personal travels.

Moreover, she decided to share her experiences with readers in a 208-page hardcover book. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, A Colorful Home includes lively palettes for every room. Rinne Allen's magnificent photographs accompany Hable's enlightening text. Throughout the book, pictorials depict each phase of the decorating project. Hable's commentary and pictures begin with abstract items, such as swatches of fabric, and progress to photographs and text describing the finished product.

Colour prevails in daily life and Hable sheds light on how a pebble, a shred of bark, a decayed leaf or irregular crystals of salt can contribute to the colour scheme. Gray neutrals lay the groundwork for serene space to harbour weary travellers. Therefore, one room is dedicated to out-of-town guests. Hable drew inspiration from rocks she had collected at the beach. Upon examination, she noted variances in texture and colour tone.

Practising what she preaches, Hable finds a way to make use of cherished items in each room, whether it is a wall hanging, a vase or sea shells. Colour preferences vary, but sometimes a hue that never appealed to the eye turns out to be a hit. Her husband wasn't a big fan of green until she highlighted it in furnishing his den. Now, he's delighted with the green accents in his "lair".

While soft colours and cozy items grace some rooms, others are bursting with bold colours and whimsical designs. Her candy-striped bathtub exemplifies the latter. Hable's colour palette and furnishings reflect the respective accommodations. Colour schemes set the mood, whether it's a child's cheery room or a formal living room.

Her rose room settings are bound to wow even the most blasé individual. Here, her colour sense and designer acumen come into play. A case in point is Hable's pink patterned wallpaper, which serves as an elegant backdrop for a parlour furnished with a plush rose rug and a gracious seating arrangement.

Hable provides a colour glossary referring to the colour wheel, shade, tint, tone, saturation, primary, secondary and tertiary hues. She defines complementary, analogous and monochromatic colour schemes. Each term has a different connotation, therefore, this section is instructive.

Hable's appreciation for nature is impressive. Moreover, readers may be inspired to display an objet d'art or souvenir instead of hiding it away. ■

Renting for independent seniors at Two Neptune

You don't have to buy it to get it anymore.

Two Neptune, a condominium for independent and active seniors aged 65 and over, has begun to offer a new option, along with their life leases.

For the first time, people can rent a suite at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community at Two Neptune Drive as opposed to having to purchase a life lease.

"There's a new opportunity in the market place and there's certainly demand from our aging adult population to be in a senior-friendly environment in a rental capacity as opposed to a purchasing capacity," said Laurie Banks, marketing and sales specialist for Two Neptune.

The building, which is half a block north of Baycrest Health Sciences' large healthcare campus, opened 15 years ago as a life-lease condominium for adults 65 and older.

Now, Two Neptune (which is owned and operated by Baycrest, but is not a care facility) is offering rental suites for the first time. Utilities are included in the monthly rent, except for electricity.

"In terms of rentals, we have one-bedroom and two-bedroom suites available that will include the storage locker and the use of building amenities and services," said Banks, who noted all rental units for new residents will be renovated and upgraded. There are many attractive features at Two Neptune for older adults: a 24-hour concierge, secured underground parking, easily accessible common areas, a social hall, and private dining room with a kosher kitchen for larger gatherings.

There is a new fitness facility on site providing classes for all levels of mobility. The classes are delivered by certified and trained fitness instructors from Baycrest's popular Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Community Centre. In addition, Two Neptune has a library with complimentary computer access for residents.

With housing prices skyrocketing in Toronto, the renting option has become very appealing for seniors who wish to downsize their home, free up the equity from a sale, and simply pay a monthly rent. The driveway clearing in winter, grass cutting in summer and other landscape and maintenance chores are taken care of.

For seniors who can't afford to purchase a life lease condominium but desire to live in this type of setting, they'll now have the option to rent at Two Neptune.

"From a population perspective, not everyone will have the funds to purchase a life-lease unit," Banks said. "The banks don't offer mortgages on a life lease, so people either need the full amount or a private broker.

"Renting is a simpler alternative and you still get to enjoy the full suite of programs and activities on site. The building fronts Bathurst Street, just south of the 401, which is perfect for seniors who want close access to the shops, cafes, synagogues, and programs at Baycrest. That's the real advantage of this location."

Older adults do not necessarily want to purchase another home at this stage of life, and rental units are in high demand. "We wanted Two Neptune to be flexible and responsive to what the market is demanding," said Banks.

"For independent seniors desiring to live in a senior-friendly environment, Two Neptune has neighbours that will be of a similar mind and, ideally, interests. Our location allows for those who are shomer Shabbat to be able to walk to local synagogues."

Two Neptune is home to a very active residents' council. Its dedicated members ensure all residents have a say in how the building is managed and the type of recreational and social programming provided on site.

"When we first moved in, our concierge Danny said, 'Welcome to the family' and he was right," said Morris Adams, current president of the residents' council. "Two Neptune is a caring community filled with programs and activities for independent seniors." ■

Love thy home: Renovations

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When I was growing up people seldom renovated their homes. They accepted the good with the bad when they purchased, and barring a flood or fire, unpacked into their houses, arranged the furniture and kept things the same for the next 20 to 30 years.

Times have changed, and today home renovations are an oft-chosen pastime, a passion borne of reality shows, glossy magazines and the skills of interior decorators. Together they've shown North America the promise and potential behind that faded carpet, mouldy grouting, ugly light fixture and ill-chosen shade of white on the walls. They've taught us the only thing between a homeowner and a gorgeous home is money and imagination. But mostly money, since creativity, if you don't have it, can be easily purchased from someone who does.

The most frequent rooms to be made over are the kitchen and bathrooms, those sanctuaries of comfort where we sate our appetites for food and hygiene. The average cost of a kitchen reno is $14,800 according to Homeadvisor.com, with most homeowners spending between $13,000 and $17,000. Bathroom renos average at $8,000 but can dip as low as $4,750 and soar up to $22,000 depending on the extent, complexity and sophistication of the re-do.

Though it may be tempting to choose a contractor on price, the Canadian Home Builders' Association warns that this is a perilous choice. "Consider the implications of choosing on price alone," it cautions in its Golden Rules of Renovating.

"Does the renovator understand what's involved in your project and have the necessary experience? Will the renovator offer a warranty on the work? Will the renovator still be in business if you need to call back?"

These are good questions and if the answers are uncertain you'll want to ask yourself if the risk outweighs the benefits. Either way, once you've given a contractor permission to move forward, expect to take an active role in the project. You'll be the primary communicator, the one showing the most flexibility and understanding as schedules delay your renovation. And you'll be the individual finding quick solutions when things don't go as planned, as inevitably happens.

It's crucial to be realistic about time frames, for example. We all want our renovation done as fast as possible, with little interruption to our daily lives. Usually, that's simply not feasible. When your contractor tells you a time frame of 'weeks,' mentally substitute the word 'months' to best prepare yourself for the actual duration of the project. "Unexpected delays" are de rigueur in the construction industry and to expect otherwise is naïve. You'd also be wise to anticipate costs amounting to well beyond your budget as substitutions are required, pipes break or the toilet you chose doesn't fit where it was supposed to.

In short, home renovations are a major headache. Why do we do them? Because they feed our addiction to beauty, and promise us more picturesque lives in prettier spaces. Sometimes, though, they're not entirely necessary. If budget restraints don't permit a full-scale reno but you can't resist the temptation to update your home, here are some shortcuts:

Call a decorator: interior decorators charge $100-to-$150 an hour but can offer the guidance you need to make dramatic changes without spending a fortune. Make a list of your biggest home gripes and ask a decorator whose work you respect to walk through your home with you. Jot down their comments along the way and ask for specifics. What colour paint would best suit your hallway? What style of handles would update your kitchen? Which piece of furniture needs to be replaced and how could a new light fixture add that je-ne-sais-quoi to your living room?

Say it with paint: interior decorators have told us time and again: there's no cheaper way to update than with a paint brush. A new colour on the walls brightens, freshens and modernizes a room, influencing its atmosphere. Visit websites like houzz.com and keep browsing and researching until you find a colour that works for you and adequately transforms the space you're trying to change.

If you're looking for stainless steel appliances you'll know they always cost more than the same machines in white. If your old appliances are still in good shape consider disguising them with peel-and-stick contact paper that contains a stainless steel finish. The façade may be all you really need.

Nothing dates a house like ancient doorknobs, handles and switchplate covers on lights and electrical outlets. New equivalents are inexpensive and easy to do-it-yourself, but can make a dramatic difference to the look of your home.

> Once you've given a contractor permission to move forward, expect to take an active role in the project

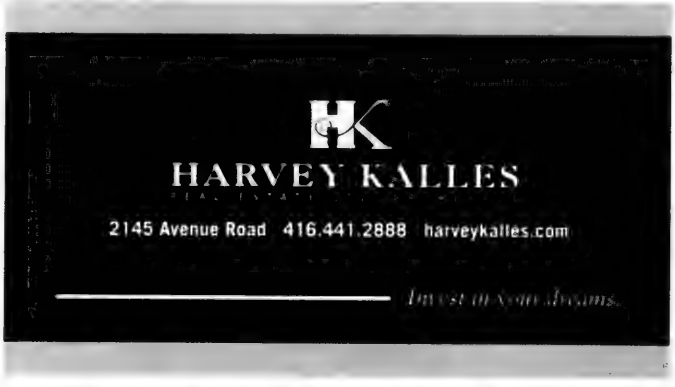
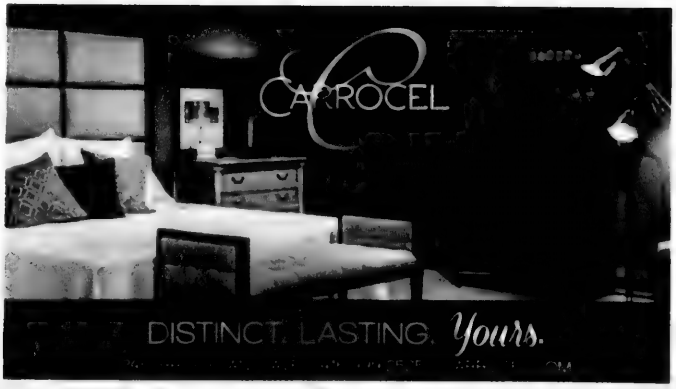
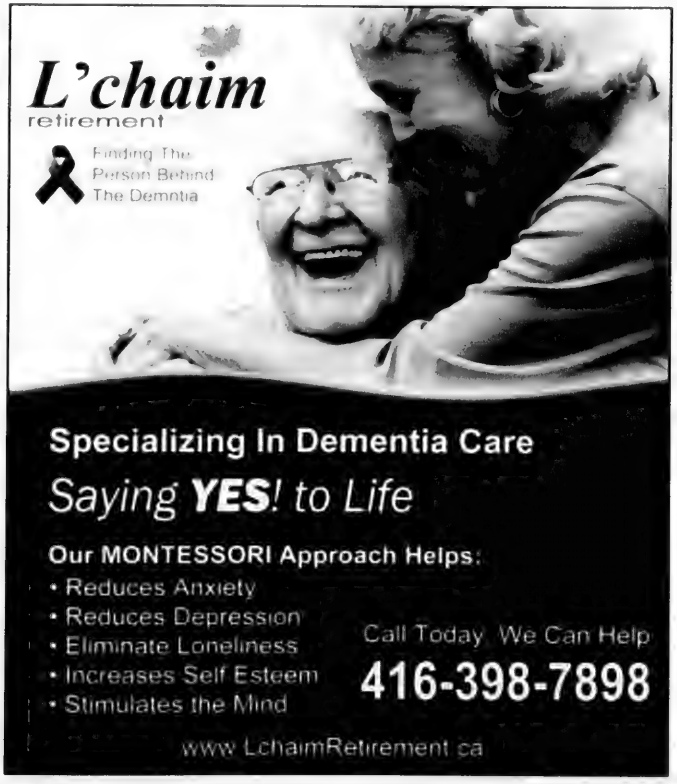
Blinding changes: take a good look at those dusty old one-inch vinyl blinds that have been hiding dead bugs for the past 20 years. Sure, they keep the light out, but that's about all they do. Switch them for two-inch wood blinds or new curtains. New window coverings, even inexpensive ones, can create powerful aesthetic changes.

Move things around: you have a lot of stuff – ask yourself if you really need to replace it or if rearranging it might be sufficient for now. By reorganizing the flow of your home, moving artwork from one room to another or turning the dining room table horizontally instead of vertically you create the feel that things have changed. And sometimes, that's all you really need. ■







Fresh herbs glorify garden and perk up menus

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO ORDINATOR

Parsley is an attractive herb and healthy to boot.

When empty nesters Karen and Allan Freedman downsized in 2012, they were convinced the two-bedroom apartment would serve their modest lifestyle. Nevertheless, the former suburban homeowners lamented the loss of their well-tended lawns and vegetable gardens.

Karen missed plucking leafy herbs from her backyard. "They always contributed a heady fragrance and flavour to our meals," she says.

Before long, the apartment dwellers realized their balcony, situated high above a busy Montreal city street, would suffice as a venue for home grown herbs. By potting plants in containers on the balcony, as well as making use of sun-filled window sills, they could count on fresh chives, dill, mint and rosemary throughout the year.

Herbs can be divided into two categories based on their stems. Those with tender stems are more grass-like, whereas herbs with woody stems sport rough leaves.

Karen garnishes platters with colourful fresh herbs, and relies on these leafy wonders to add a tantalizing tang to her homemade dips, soups, salads, fish, meat and other recipes.

"You don't need a green thumb to plant herbs, whether in the ground or in a container," she says.

Some herbs do better than others in cold climates, regardless of whether they are planted in or outdoors.

"Sometimes, I've had luck with parsley, basil and oregano but I advise novices to start with chives, mint, rosemary and dill," she says.

"In fact, when we had a garden, chives and mint sprouted automatically every spring, whereas most of the others had to be planted annually."

Every fledgling gardener wishes for a hardy crop but Karen cautions, "Be careful what you wish for. Now, we know better, but 15 years ago, mint dominated our entire garden. Remember, mint spreads,therefore, a little goes a long way."

Botanists note that consumers tend to confuse herbs with spices. Herbs are the leaves of fresh or dried plants, while spices are the aromatic parts of buds, fruit, berries, roots or bark, often dried from plants that thrive in tropical regions. Despite this distinction, both herbs and spices enhance the flavour of food. In some instances, herbs like dill contain seeds that can be used as pickling spices.

Chives are perennial winners in Quebec climates. They do well if planted late spring either in the ground or in plant containers on the balcony. They grow quickly in the sun or shade. Make sure the soil is moist but don't drown the roots in a pool of water. Remember, chives have thick roots and store water better than many other locally grown plants. To harvest chives, cut across the plant about an inch from the soil. Then the plant is ready to sprout anew. Chives can be stored in the refrigerator or freezer. A member of the onion, shallot and leek family, chives are rich in vitamins A and C. Chives are more delicate and contain less sulfur than onions. Although chives are available in the supermarket, nothing surpasses the freshness of the home cultivated variety. Chives spruce up vegetable dishes, omelets, salads and soups.

Parsley derives its name from the Greek word "rock celery." It comes in many varieties and though some local gardeners have more luck than others, it is well worth planting. Parsley, a biennial, flowers in its second season. Make sure the soil is moist but not soaking wet. To harvest, snip off the oldest branches giving young leaves sufficient space. Sprigs of parsley serve as a stunning garnish and complement soups, sides, and main course platters. Parsley is a source of vitamins A, C, K and a natural breath freshener.

There are 600 varieties of mint, an aromatic herb with grassy, menthol properties. It is used in recipes for sweet and savoury dishes. Spearmint and peppermint flavours grow well locally. The dark green leaves are closely set together. These hardy herbs are embodied with distinctive scents. They can become the alpha of the garden because the plants spread and dominate the scene.

Mint embellishes lamb dishes, salads, tea, fruit beverages and cocktails. It grows easily and will boost a fledgling gardener's confidence because it invariably takes root and blossoms without much puttering. For window sill success, place pots where mint is exposed to morning sun and some afternoon shade. Mint can be rinsed, placed in paper towel, tucked in a plastic bag and stored for a few days in the refrigerator. Consumers can purchase mint seedlings or plants and transplant them to a container.

Dill is prized for its seeds and leaves. The aromatic feathery, bright green leaves have multiple uses and can be used fresh, or kept in a refrigerator vegetable bin or in the freezer. To store fresh dill, wrap in a plastic bag and chill in the refrigerator. To freeze fresh dill, rinse, trim and chop the silky leaves. Allow it to dry thoroughly and then store in heavy-duty freezer bags, or fill each compartment of an ice cube tray with chopped dill embedded in water. Dill freezes beautifully.

When preparing soup, simply transfer the dill-filled ice cube to the broth and vegetables in the soup pot. Dill keeps fresh for 10-12 days in the fridge and four to six months in the freezer. A sprig of dill adds a dash of class to a fish platter and also dazzles the recipient's taste buds.

Rosemary grows well in the summer and lasts until Sukkot. This herb is averse to chilly weather conditions, so bring it indoors and transplant in pots facing the sun. Rosemary requires steady drainage, therefore, a terra cotta pot is ideal. Its pungent flavour adds a distinctive taste to poultry and vegetable dishes. ■

Create a dream kitchen in less time than you think

An updated kitchen does more than boost the value of your home. It is the central meeting place for most families. So no matter whether you make just a few changes or completely renovate the space, a kitchen that feels new is always refreshing and welcoming. From basic cooking to frequent entertaining, a dream kitchen should always look as good as it functions.

Since the modern kitchen design is ever evolving, so are the products available, say advisers in this field. Skip the fads and include features that are not only esthetically pleasing but will withstand the test of time. Here are a few easy updates to turn your current space into the one you've been dreaming about.

Go bold with fixtures: When remodelling a kitchen, remember to top off the highly used sink area with a fashionable and functional kitchen faucet.

With a great number of faucets on the market, there's a design for everyone. For a sleek, contemporary look at the sink, try the new Tilt kitchen faucet from Moen Canada. It features a distinct, top-mount handle – allowing the faucet to occupy a small horizontal space for the utmost in urban minimalism. The thoughtfully designed faucet also combines the best of style and functionality with its innovative pullout design and integrated swivel ball joint to make it easier to manoeuvre the wand in and around the sink.

Be smart with appliances: Unlike a rug or lamp, kitchen appliances are not simple to return, so be smart – not flashy –when upgrading these items. Before making a purchase, it's best to work with a professional for guidance, and to weigh all factors, such as who uses the kitchen, how many people are cooking at one time, and how often your family cooks.

If you're an aspiring chef, consider a gas range that allows you to control the flame with precision. If you're a busy mom, electric versions allow you to heat food and boil water faster. It's also important to consider finishes – if the rest of your fixtures are brushed nickel, you may want to opt for a stainless steel range, refrigerator and dishwasher for a coordinated look.

Add an island: Whether you're hoping for more storage, seating or cooking space, an island can do it all. Many homeowners choose to build an island within their kitchen as a place for family and friends to gather and socialize. A multi-level design with stools on one side can provide casual seating for guests, leaving the other side available for you to prepare food or serve appetizers.

If you like to cook and entertain, you may also want a design that includes a bar/prep sink and beverage faucet – this will aid in prep and provide fresh drinking water. The Sip beverage faucet from Moen offers a co-ordinating style for every decorating taste – traditional, transitional or modern. It provides cold, filtered water on demand, and with its high-arc rotating spout it delivers extra convenience when filling pitchers, coffee makers and more.

Amp up lighting: Merely changing out the decorative lighting fixtures over the breakfast nook or centre island can have a significant visual impact, creating a fresher, more up-to-date design.

For a warm and inviting environment, combine four layers of lighting: task, ambient, accent and decorative. This will help you obtain your desired style while still providing the appropriate light. The ability to adjust light levels is also important. When cooking or cleaning up, a bright punch of illumination makes the job easier. For lingering over a meal and conversation, dimmed lights help create ambiance.

Whether your dream kitchen involves a complete overhaul or a simple spruce up, take the necessary steps, plan accordingly, and make your design dreams become a reality. ■

Wheel of Conscience returns home, and Portman speaks her mind

Sculpture back in Halifax

After almost a year being repaired in Toronto, famed architect Daniel Libeskind's Wheel of Conscience Holocaust memorial sculpture is back at the Canadian Museum of Immigration at Pier 21 in Halifax. The sculpture, which recalls that in 1939, Canada turned away the MS St. Louis and its 937 passengers fleeing the Nazis, had experienced technical problems since its unveiling in 2011. It was being repaired by its builders for the museum's reopening last week after extensive renovations. It's now on the ground floor and visible to patrons without having to pay admission.

Not a fan of Bibi

Israeli-born actress Natalie Portman discussed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and living in Paris as a Jew in a May 15 interview in the Hollywood Reporter.

Natalie Portman after her 2011 Oscar win

Portman is promoting the May 18 debut of her film based on Israeli author Amos Oz's A Tale of Love and Darkness, which was shot in Hebrew in Jerusalem. She told the weekly she was disappointed Netanyahu was re-elected and "find[s] his racist comments horrific." Asked whether she's nervous living in Paris with her French husband and son, 3, after the Hyper Cacher attack, Portman said "Yes, but I'd feel nervous being a black man in [America]. I'd feel nervous being a Muslim in many places." She also called Dershowitz, whom she worked for while a Harvard undergrad, "a good friend" who "has very different politics than I do."

Soccer head stands firm on Israel

FIFA president Sepp Blatter reiterated an earlier pledge that Israel won't be suspended from soccer's global governing body – and its sanctioned events, including World Cup qualifiers – as long as it fulfils "its statutory duties." Blatter met May 6 with Israeli soccer officials at FIFA headquarters in Zurich. The Palestinian Football Association wants a vote at next month's FIFA congress to suspend Israel for "racist behaviour against Arabs" in the form of travel restrictions between Gaza and the West Bank, saying they inhibit athletes' training. ■

Looking at maps

Prof. Mira Sucharov finds it "difficult to know where to begin" in explaining Israel's "military occupation over millions of Palestinians." What I actually find most difficult is to understand her rationale and the faulty analogies she derives from ignoring key facts ("Why is the Green Line not on our schools' maps?" May 7).

First, the reality is that Israel's borders do "span from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River." This reality, established by our historical connection to the Land of Israel, confirmed in the Mandate for Palestine in 1922 and reiterated in the Israel-Jordan Peace Treaty of 1994, has unfortunately been blurred – if not totally forgotten – since the advent of the Oslo peace process and the emergence of a putative and hitherto unheard of Palestinian state.

Second, with regard to maps, we are not "doing the same thing [with our maps] we accuse our adversaries of doing." We are doing exactly the opposite: we are correcting a baseless fallacy and replacing it with a fully justified depiction of a reality recognized in international law 95 years ago.

Third, by referring to the "occupation," Sucharov falls into the trap planted by the Palestinians and their supporters, without realizing that in all logic, the whole of Israel would be viewed as equally occupied, because no one can make a rational distinction between territory acquired in 1967 and those acquired in 1948, both in response to Arab aggression.

No wonder then, that J Street, Rabbi Rick Jacobs' Union for Reform Judaism and Yachad – all ostensibly claiming to be "pro-Israel, pro-peace" groups – identify themselves more with the fake Palestinian narrative than with established Jewish territorial rights. That Sucharov supports the initiatives promoted by these groups is really difficult to understand.

Funding for schools

Canada is a secular country, and the idea of supporting the Jewish separate schools with public money is outdated.

If it could be done politically, I would eliminate support for the Catholic school system in Ontario, but that would not be pursued by any political leaders.

I agree the Jewish separate schools need help, but it should come from within the Jewish community.

I am a secular Jew but the protection of Jewish identity is also important to me, and I would help with a donation in this regard. Maybe there are others who feel the same way. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto could act as the distributor of the funds, but it must be money designated for this purpose by the donors.

French immigrants welcome

Whether it is boisterous singing emanating from sukkahs, sections of streets being closed down for dancing with the Torah on Simchat Torah, the scent of chametz being burned before Passover, or a lively party in the park for Lag b'Omer, we are a comfortable and proud community of Diaspora Jews. Moreover, we are comfortable displaying our Jewishness in areas of Montreal in which few Jews reside as well.

This comfort is not grounded in naiveté. Multiculturalism and religious freedom are core values of Canadian society, in opposition to the often oppressively applied concept of secularism.

I acknowledge that these values require a different balance in different places of the world. I am eternally grateful for having been born into a society in which the emphasis can be put on multiculturalism and religious freedom and their entrenchment into law have resulted in a peaceful and welcoming society.

Accordingly, I am extending my own invitation to the Jewish community in France. Quebec's immigration policy is most open to individuals who are fluent in French. In fact, the quotas imposed on the number of applications that the Quebec government will receive for consideration under the investor class or the entrepreneur class do not apply to prospective immigrants who can demonstrate advanced intermediate knowledge of French.

Furthermore, Montreal has an extensive network of Jewish organizations that help in the integration of new Jewish immigrants. We are here to welcome your friends and relatives, our brothers and sisters, with open arms.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Is the Torah literal or figurative?

Modern tools of interpretation can enhance our understanding of sacred texts without compromising our tenacity in maintaining Jewish practice

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: Recently, several of my Orthodox colleagues have come under scrutiny for discussing the idea that the events of the Bible may not have occurred exactly as described in the text.

Critical Bible scholars also assert that they actually have a better understanding of how the text of the Bible came to be. While this is nothing new in liberal denominations, only recently have these ideas begun to be explored in Orthodoxy.

I want to reflect on this as we approach Shavuot, the holiday that celebrates the revelation at Sinai. Does one have to take a traditional approach to revelation in order to fully appreciate the Torah in the 21st century?

How can more liberal thinkers experience Shavuot and the daily practice of Torah? How should Jewish Bible critics relate to their traditional co-religionists?

Rabbi Scheim: In my student years, I lived out the conflict between the literalist approach of revelation – that all of Torah, written and oral, emanated from Sinai – and the critical approach – that Torah, while still sacred, had human involvement, over time, in its transmission.

My rabbinic studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary reflected the critical/scientific approach, while the time that I chose to spend in an Orthodox yeshiva offered the literalist approach. I found myself caught somewhere in-between.

I don't believe that Shavuot and Matan Torah (the Sinai revelation) is necessarily less relevant to one who holds the critical approach, given that the Judaism we practise is in many instances far removed from the Torah text and dependent upon the interpretation and creativity of the rabbinic sages. But it is incumbent upon "critics" to be fully respectful of their more literalist co-religionists, because it is their traditionalist passion, which is often lacking in more liberal quarters, that sustains Jewish practice and Jewish learning.

Rabbi Finegold: My experience seems to be woven into a similar tapestry. I grew up hearing a very literalist approach to the text, and eventually was exposed to the scholarship of Bible critics in university.

Thus my dilemma was how to reconcile the truth of my religious experience with the literary truth of the Bible. In other words, how could I retain the tradition I was taught with the multiplicity of voices in the text?

My approach, which was far from novel, was to recognize that, at a minimum, God could write in a multiplicity of voices for any number of reasons, exegetical or otherwise. While that may not be where I stand at the moment, it was a critical first step in embracing both sides of the equation.

As you put it so eloquently, I am not ready to lose the passion in favour of a Judaism that takes its cues from a God that only exists in the remains of an archeological dig or a literary analysis. Shavuot, then, is a time to celebrate the interpretation of the Torah, not just the receiving of a text.

Rabbi Scheim: "Saw you at Sinai," a popular web-dating site aimed at traditional Jews, reflects the understanding that every Jew ever to live was present at Sinai, when the Torah was revealed to the people of Israel.

I love the connection between Internet dating and Torah, which brings together cutting-edge technology and eternal Torah-based values. Rather than undermining Jewish tradition, "Saw you at Sinai" reinforces the link between 21st-century life and our ancestral faith.

Similarly, modern tools of interpretation have the power to enhance our understanding of Torah, of biblical and rabbinic texts, without needing to compromise our tenacity in maintaining Jewish practice. As long as we recognize the voice – or voices – of God in the texts we study, our faith will be enhanced by continuing to grapple with every word lovingly handed down to us from generation to generation. ■

Behind the Jewish music

In the early 2000s, a band burst onto the scene and changed Jewish music forever. In honour of Jewish Music Week, currently ongoing in Toronto, this is their story.

As the four lads took the stage for their first show, little did anyone know that Jewish music would never be the same again. They had met in the day school system and spent summers together. Some of them had previously played together in other musical projects, but nothing could have prepared concertgoers for what they were about to witness.

In those early, formative years, members of the band that would come to be known as Shirayim ("leftovers" in Hebrew) honed their chops on Toronto's Jewish-events circuit. They played bar and bat mitzvahs, school carnivals and half-empty halls on second-rate Jewish holidays. Wherever the boys plugged in, controversy followed. They were met with anguished cries: "Turn it down," "Turn it down even more" and "For God's sake, please stop with that noise." But the band, now a five-piece, kept on truckin'.

All that time spent on the road, hauling gear from one synagogue to the next, helped the guys refine their trademark sound – raw, aggressive, in-your-face and utterly danceable. There was nothing else like it, and with every passing gig, Shirayim was winning over more and more fans. To the city's establishment, the band represented all that was wrong with young Jews; to a generation of teenagers, they were Jewish music's loveable bad boys.

Soon enough, they were headlining on Yom Ha'atzmaut and at the Walk for Israel. Shirayim had hit it big. But for these five 20-somethings, the question now became: What's next? Fame came with its fair share of benefits, sure, but the guys began to tire of the celebrity life. Some nights, they couldn't even hear themselves over the shrieks of the teenage throngs. They began to wonder if anyone was actually listening.

Shirayim had made its name playing for live audiences, but now the band retreated to the studio to write and record its magnum opus, a concept album called Sons and Builders. The new material saw Shirayim exploring its diverse roots in some unexpected ways. It was still intense and brash, of course, but also more introspective and, at times, verging on quiet.

As the record's release date approached, the guys wondered how their new sound would be received. They needn't have worried. Fans and critics offered high praise for Sons and Builders, and the band followed it up with a series of concerts across downtown Toronto. Orthodox youngsters lined up outside venues like the Horseshoe Tavern just to get a glimpse of Shirayim in action.

The band was now at the height of its popularity. And yet, after years together, the members of Shirayim were tiring of the grind. Our long, strange trip was over.

Music historians debate whether Shirayim ever officially broke up, or if its members simply drifted apart. Fans of the band still hope for one more show – a last hora, if you will. It's hard to say if that will ever happen, but at least we'll always have the music. Nothing can take that away. ■ — YONI

Il Duce's Jewish love affairs

Erol Araf

Although victory often eluded Benito Mussolini on the fields of Mars, it seldom abandoned him in the boudoirs of Venus.

A latter-day Casanova, Mussolini revelled in his deserved reputation as the quintessential Latin lover. His insatiable appetites led to two wives, hundreds of affairs, and numerous casual encounters. "There was a time when I had 14 women and took three or four of them every evening, one after the other," he once said.

Less known about Mussolini's affairs, however, are the passionate liaisons he had with three Jewish women. Clearly, despite his prejudices, Il Duce was an equal opportunity lover.

"From 1912 to 1914, Mussolini was the Che Guevara of his day, a living saint of leftism," writes David Ramsay Steele in Mystery of Fascism. A dedicated Marxist, Mussolini would mesmerize the masses with his magnetic personality, fierce penetrating eyes, courage, charisma and fiery oratorical gifts. Little wonder then that he caught the eye of Angelica Balabanoff, the socialite daughter of a Russian Jewish millionaire, who rejected her family's bourgeois lifestyle and proceeded to fall madly in love with Mussolini.

The pair met in Milan where Mussolini had begun his new job as editor of the leftist publication Avanti. He hired Balabanoff as his assistant editor because she knew Vladimir Lenin and was well respected in European socialist and labour movements.

In her biography, My Life as a Rebel, Balabanoff described their first meeting at an international celebration of the Paris Commune in Geneva: "He was one of the speakers. He sat tense and pale, nervously twisting his fingers, absorbed in himself and isolated from the crowd. He was more shabbily dressed than anyone else and more unkempt and dirty. But when he spoke, he acquired assurance, his eyes shone dark and fiery, and his square jaw pushed forward adding power to his words."

Their affair may well have been the reason behind Mussolini's decision to leave his long-suffering wife, Rachele, and their two-year-old daughter Edda in Forli when he moved to Milan. As discussed by Mussolini's biographer, Laura Fermi, a prevalent rumour of the time was that Edda might have been Balabanoff's illegitimate daughter adopted by Rachele to avoid a scandal. This was strenuously denied by both women and subsequently by Edda as well.

After Mussolini traversed from one ideological extreme to the other, a bitterly disappointed Balabanoff ended the affair. Later in life, as a committed anti-Fascist activist, she would reminisce about Mussolini's timorousness, lack of character, infidelity and "inspired mediocrity."

Of course, a clash in views was not the sole factor in their relationship's decline. While the ideological rift between the pair was certainly strongly felt, Mussolini's plethora of affairs could not have helped matters either.

Before Balabanoff entered the picture, around the time Edda was born, Mussolini experienced a torrid affair with a married Jewish woman of Polish descent, Fernanda Ostrovski. She too was a passionate socialist who gifted Mussolini with a son born in Trento. The child lived only a few months, and Ostrovski was heartbroken and eventually abandoned by Mussolini.

Mussolini later found solace in the arms of Margherita Sarfatti, a married Jewish woman who stood by him from his days as a socialist agitator all the way through to his ultimate rise to power.

Benito Mussolini

Their affair was unintentionally initiated by Sarfatti's husband, Cesare. When Sarfatti, already active in socialist causes, received a letter from Cesare in 1911 about "meeting a wonderful young man who [was] destined to dominate the party," she was instinctively attracted by the idea of a handsome youth unfurling the red flag and leading the masses to the barricades.

She finally met him in the salons of the left and became mesmerized by Mussolini's virile looks, intellectual energy and boundless self-confidence. Mussolini, too, was drawn to her as she was blonde, beautiful, wealthy, and the wife of a prominent jurist.

For more than 20 years, Mussolini and Sarfatti were involved in a love affair that saw the pair through political publications and intrigues, betrayal of close friends, changes of allegiances and coups d'état. To Mussolini, Sarfatti was an intimate friend, patron and adviser with whom he could share his innermost fears, ambitions and dreams in a way he could not with other women.

It was mainly thanks to her influence that he began to acquire bourgeois manners, shed his rough edges, alter his appearance and begin to take care of his personal hygiene, a trait not considered to be his forte. In short, as the only woman whose advice Mussolini actively sought out, Sarfatti played a key role in Mussolini's irresistible rise to fame and power. Indeed, she was so close to Mussolini that she can easily be described as one of the founders of Italian fascism.

However, by the 1930s, Sarfatti had lost her looks, and at the apogee of his power, Mussolini did not want to be encumbered by a Jewish woman from his modest past. Desperate not to lose him, Sarfatti converted to Catholicism and frequently reminded her lover that her son had died for Italy during World War I. Although her pleas fell on deaf ears, Sarfatti nevertheless remained steadfast in her love for and loyalty to Mussolini. Indeed, despite her former lover's anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic policies, she continued to write articles maintaining that there was no "Jewish question" in Italy and that Mussolini "would never follow Hitler's anti-Semitic policies."

Despite her claims that there was no cause for alarm, Sarfatti eventually had to escape to Argentina to save her life, and her sister Nella's family would go on to perish in Auschwitz. After the war, Sarfatti returned to Italy to resume her artistic career and published an unapologetic memoir in 1955. She remained in love with Mussolini all the way until she took her last breath in 1961.

Sarfatti's enduring love for Mussolini, even after the horrors of the Holocaust became public, confirms Thomas Mann's observation, "It is love, not reason, that is stronger than death." ■

How much does a Jewish funeral cost?

It depends on where you live in Canada

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

It's something none of us likes to think about, but we all know it's coming.

Death is inevitable, yet it remains a taboo subject in our society, surrounded by secrecy and swirling with the mystery of the unknown, even among many Jews.

In an effort to get some cold, hard facts The CJN did some research into the cost of Jewish burial across Canada. Not surprisingly, the price tag differs vastly according to the city in which you're laid to rest and the status of your membership at a particular synagogue in that locale.

Members of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax, N.S., for example, will pay $4,500 for Jewish burial, which includes burial fees of $2,000 and perpetual care of the gravesite for $2,500. The price also includes the cost of the coffin, the chapel fees for the eulogy service and the fee for the chevra kadisha. If you've not been a member of the synagogue for five years, or if you're not a member at all, the cost of burial jumps to $8,225. Extras in both instances are hospital pickup of the deceased, funeral home services and headstones.

In Winnipeg, a plot, Jewish burial and perpetual care costs $10,000 for members of Congregation Shaarey Zedek and $14,000 for non-members. Members don't have to pay extra for use of the chapel, but if you aren't a member, you'll be forking out more for that, as you also will if you hold the service at Chesed Shel Emes, a funeral home in the city, or elsewhere.

Saskatoon's Congregation Agudas Israel charges about $8,000 for Jewish burial for its members and $12,000 for non-members. Those prices are going up this year, warns Ralph Katzman, who heads the shul's cemetery committee, adding the fee includes the use of the synagogue's chapel and is a complete service, encompassing hospital or home pickup, coffin, taharah, a signing book and the burial plot. The price fluctuates with inflation and has gone up by about seven per cent over the past three years, he says. Another variable controlling the price of burial is the cost of the hearse, which is contracted out to a local funeral home.

If you're planning on dying in Vancouver, you'd better save up for the event. A plot at Schara Tzedeck Cemetery runs about $11,000 on average, though the price drops if you have a blood relative buried there or if you're a member of Congregation Schara Tzedeck. Less expensive plots can be found at other Jewish cemeteries in Metro Vancouver, like the one in Surrey, B.C., where plots cost $3,000 for synagogue members and $5,000 for non-members.

A funeral at Schara Tzedeck Cemetery, which includes use of the cemetery chapel, casket, halachic preparation, clergy fees, transportation to cemetery and administrative fees, among other items, adds another $11,000 to the equation. The costs include a licensed funeral director at $800, the chevra kadisha and halachic preparation at $1,260, and services of staff and overhead at $1,000.

Digging and filling the grave is an $1,100 expense, and having clergy at the funeral costs $800. One rabbi who spoke on condition of anonymity noted that he is paid $375 per funeral, but added that the rituals surrounding death are time consuming and involve visiting with family and preparing a eulogy. He estimated his total time at 10 hours.

For those without the funds, price is never a barrier to Jewish burial, says Howard Jampolsky, executive director of the Schara Tzedeck Cemetery board. When individuals or families can't afford the cost, efforts are always made to ensure that every Jew has a right to a Jewish burial. In the 2014 fiscal year, he estimated, the cemetery board subsidized between $150,000 and $170,000 worth of funeral expenses, including burial plots.

While expensive, the price of plots at Schara Tzedeck Cemetery is on par with other cemeteries in Vancouver, Jampolsky noted. "The City of Vancouver charges $22,500 for a two-person plot and at Ocean View Cemetery [in Burnaby, B.C.] they start at $32,000," he said.

In Richmond, B.C., Beth Tikvah Congregation charges members $14,000 for Jewish burial, including headstone and burial plot. But that's just for Jews who have been members three years or longer. If you've been a member for less than three years, you'll pay $19,000, and if you're not a member at all, $21,000. The synagogue refused to share a breakdown of how those costs were allocated.

Out east, in Ottawa, plot costs vary considerably by cemetery. At the Bank Street cemetery, plots cost $3,750, while at the Osgoode cemetery, they cost $2,400. Tammy Torontow, executive director of Ottawa's Jewish Memorial Gardens, said the funeral homes in the city handle coffin fees and hospital pickups for the deceased. Additional costs are for the opening and closing of a grave, which costs $2,700 in the winter and $2,200 in the summer.

In Toronto, caskets can range in price from $800 up to $35,000, according to Marc Benjamin, vice-president of operations at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel. Established in 1922, the chapel takes care of everything related to the death of a Jewish individual. The costs can easily add up to $10,000-plus, and that's only for the least expensive burial plot and the cheapest casket.

The ties that bind Israel and Germany

DJ Schneeweiss and Walter Stechel

On Aug. 19, 1965, ambassador Rolf Pauls of Germany presented his credentials to Israel's president Zalman Shazar. The tension and solemnity of the occasion were evident. Formal intergovernmental relations were being launched between Israel and Germany in the dreadful shadow of the Shoah.

Three milestones paved the way for this historic rapprochement. The Luxembourg Agreement of 1952, which constituted the Federal Republic of Germany's assumption of responsibility for the consequences of the Holocaust; the meeting in March 1960 between David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, and Konrad Adenauer, Germany's first chancellor; and the 1961 trial of Adolf Eichmann.

The Luxembourg Agreement formed the foundation for opening a dialogue, which, after long years of deliberate, mutual and courageous effort, culminated in the meeting between Ben-Gurion and Adenauer. The Eichmann trial helped change the two countries' perception of each other, making it possible to look forward to a different future.

Formal diplomatic ties between Germany and Israel were established on May 12, 1965, a landmark day in the history of both countries. The 50 years since have been marked by the rapid development of relationships and contacts in all fields, and the burgeoning of a friendship that has become part of the bedrock of international affairs. German-Israeli ties now cover every possible field of human endeavour and achievement, from scientific research and technological innovation, to youth exchange programs, civic partnerships, municipal exchanges, cultural collaborations, sport, tourism and much more.

Today, a quarter of all Israelis have visited Germany, while more than 700,000 young people have participated in bilateral exchange projects. Meanwhile, a trade relationship worth a mere $100 million in 1960 has grown to $7.4 billion in 2013, making Germany Israel's third-most-important trading partner, after the United States and China. Israel, in turn, is Germany's second-most-important trading partner in the Near and Middle East.

At the government level, building upon the deep desire of both peoples, our countries have worked consistently to expand and deepen mutual trust and understanding, as well as the platforms for exchange and interaction that make it possible for these to flourish. Visits at the highest political levels have developed into regular exchanges, including annual government-to-government consultations and close co-ordination between trusted partners. Israeli President Reuven Rivlin was on a state visit in Germany last week.

At the core of Adenauer's and Ben-Gurion's efforts was the recognition on the German side of the need to demonstrate in the most concrete terms – to itself, to Israel and the Jewish world, and to the broader international community – that the country had detached from its Nazi past and was committed to the responsibility that the past had laid at Germany's door. For Israel, close relations with Germany were a geopolitical imperative for the young state, a matter of securing Israel's future in the family of nations, without forgetting the past.

The unique relationship built by our two nations in the five decades of our ties has helped both countries normalize our international standing, entrench our security and economic well-being, and make meaningful contributions to global society.

This success is founded upon three key principles: Germany's ironclad commitment to the security of Israel, for which every Israeli is grateful; our mutual commitment to remembrance and education of the next generation; and our mutual understanding that the well-being of our people requires that we work together to build a safe and prosperous future for all.

German-Israeli relations are built on this dual commitment to the past and the future. A unique trust and a real friendship have been courageously fashioned out of the abyss created by the horrors of the Nazi era. We are proud of what our two countries have achieved together and full of optimism for what lies ahead. ■

What's the most powerful form of Jewish education?

Daniel Held

As parents make choices about their children's education, I'm often asked what is the most powerful setting of Jewish learning. Weighing day schools and daycares, supplementary schools and Israel experiences, youth movements, camps, the March of the Living, Birthright Israel, Diller, synagogue programs, JCCs and the dozens of other options, parents want to know what experiences will guide their children toward lives imbued with Jewish meaning.

The question is reasonable and rooted in concern for our children's Jewish future, but it's also rooted in the belief that Jewish education and identity development lies in the hands of others and not our own. That's not the case.

My response to these parents is that the most powerful setting of Jewish learning is the home. The character of a family's Jewish life is the most important predictor of a child's future Jewish life. Parents' modelling of Jewish living – in their own actions and in their decisions for their children – is a key ingredient in forming strong Jewish identities. The decisions to go together to synagogue, celebrate Shabbat, give tzedakah, and generally make Jewish decisions have a profound impact on the ways that children think about Judaism.

What's more, Jewish education – even in its most robust forms in Jewish day schools and other immersive environments – cannot stand alone. While a child may be able to master math or science, reading or geography in school without outside support, the same is not true for Jewish education. If learning is not reinforced at home, it loses its relevance to, and resilience in, a child's life.

There is no one-stop shop for Jewish learning. No one setting of education – not matter how strong – can be expected to stand on its own. Rather, the most powerful form of Jewish education is a cocktail of educative experiences.

Some time ago, I visited a synagogue which had an open playroom, but no educational children's program on Shabbat morning. When I asked why, I was told that the vast majority of children in the shul are day school students, so they don't need Jewish education on Shabbat. I've heard similar stories of families who say that their child "gets Jewish" throughout the year, so they take the summer off to go to a non-Jewish camp. This thinking places an unfair burden on the school. No one setting of Jewish education is the panacea. When a child has multiple touch points, with different curricula, different modalities of teaching, and, most importantly, different teachers and role models, the impact on his Jewish identity is multiplied.

Finally, in making decisions about our children's Jewish education, we must realize that it's not about one time in their lives. I've been asked when is the time to send a child to Jewish educational programs. Some would like to say that preschool gives the necessary grounding. Others argue that Jewish education up to bar mitzvah provides the basic literacy a child needs to participate in Jewish life, while still others argue that high school is the crucial period of identity formation.

These views are shortsighted. Jewish learning, to have a true impact on one's life, has to be lifelong. It begins at birth, when we read stories about Shabbat, the holidays and tzedakah and continues throughout life into adulthood.

The question of what is the most powerful form of Jewish education comes from a place of love and commitment to our children. The answer, however, is not as simple as selecting from a list of A, B or C, rather, it's D, all of the above. One researcher coined the phrase "the more the more" – the more time, the more touch points, the more role models a child is exposed to, the more her Jewish identity and commitment will grow. ■

Giving a voice to our Canadian sages

Jean M. Gerber

Passover is behind us, Shavuot ahead. But it was only after the seders that we were given a copy of the Canadian Haggadah Canadienne. What a treat!

We own over 50 different Haggadot: a huge facsimile of the Ryeland Haggadah and others from Spain and Ashkenaz, a tiny Maxwell House coffee one, a Ben Shahn one with an introduction by Louis Finkelstein, and the modern Moss Haggadah. Each comes with a wonderful back story.

But to have one published in Canada, with commentary from across the nation in French and English is unique. We received it too late for inclusion in this year's feasts, but there is always next year in Vancouver, if not in Jerusalem.

We loved the cover photo "Opening of the Manischewitz Co. Matzah Plant" in Quebec! Although we have noticed that, over the years, the matzot have gotten smaller – but no less, well, effective.

We looked for any photos from "the West." And there they were: Lipton, Sask.; Lethbridge, Alta.; Calgary, Winnipeg, Victoria, Prince George, Burnaby. And our own beloved Rabbi Pastinsky in Vancouver. Each picture seems to have been chosen to complement the text and commentary.

But the pictures are not the primary thing, although they do span a continent, creating a pictorial history of Jews in Canada. The main event is the commentary.

What a treasure-house. Not only do the pictures tell a transcontinental story, but the commentary spans Canada's denominational spectrum.

Naturally we looked for Klei Kodesh (community and shul leaders) from Vancouver. There they were.

Our own Rabbi Jonathan Infeld of Beth Israel Congregation had the opportunity to comment on the maror. The pictures symbolized some bitter lives, including a ragged prospector, Marco Zimmerman, in the Yukon c. 1920, who had a bitter life, indeed, but a chosen one. Not so lives of the slaves in Egypt.

As Rabbi Infeld writes, "Many Canadian Jews are Holocaust survivors or direct descendants of survivors [as he is]... But as we move further and further away from the terrible tragedy, the taste of the maror in the midst of a joyous celebration will help us feel the history of our people."

A favourite picture of mine is a parade in Toronto celebrating the new State of Israel. On the back of a "Reliable Movers" truck stands J.B. Salsberg, a one-time activist in the Canadian Communist party, above a sign that reads: "Greetings on this historical day of our people's victory... J.B. Salsberg"

The picture introduces the Hallel portion of the seder. Hallelujah!

Rabbi Andrew Rosenblatt of Vancouver's Schara Tzedeck synagogue comments on the portion of the seder featuring four rabbis discussing the telling of the Exodus story at night (really they are discussing time for the recitation of the evening Shema, but that is not the point here).

There is, he says, a historical Exodus, but also by telling the story we actually can participate in that Exodus: "the narrative of the narration is itself a form of Exodus."

There is so much more in this edition that we will explore next year, maybe in conjunction with the New American Hagaddah produced several years ago. Each will provide thoughts from current generations of scholars and laypeople.

If the Exodus event is our foundational event, the Haggadah is our most loved guidebook to it. Every year, we can find something new in this document, produced over the last 2,000 years. The Haggadah is itself a commentary on our peoples' history. Now Canadian Jewry is a part of that history.

Rabbi ben Lakish remarked: "Say not... how much better were the old days than these! Say not... if Rabbi Tarfon were alive, then I should go to study Torah with him. In the end, you only have the sages of your own generation."

Not that we lack for sages – indeed, we have our own, Canadian ones! And they are much in evidence in this Haggadah, as they should be. ■

Will Iran's support for anti-Israel forces increase?

Paul Michaels

It never fails. No sooner did Israel announce in late April that it was sending a team of 260 rescue workers and medical staff to Nepal in response to that country's catastrophic earthquake than the sniping began: how dare Israel divert attention from the terrible hardships of Gaza, where it has imposed a blockade since 2007?

"Easier to address a far-away humanitarian disaster than the nearby one of Israel's making in Gaza," tweeted Ken Roth, director of Human Rights Watch.

On the subject of Gaza's humanitarian crisis being "one of Israel's making," how does it escape Roth, among other "human rights defenders," that, as reigning authority in Gaza – despite its "unity" agreement last year with the Palestinian Authority – Hamas is the one that bears overwhelming responsibility for the state of misery it has brought upon its own people?

Then again, given Human Rights Watch's record of anti-Israel bias, it's simply too appealing for Roth to ignore Hamas' repressive and callous policies toward its citizens and instead place all blame for their plight on Israel.

Roth's attitude is outrageous. After all, it's Hamas that has chosen the self-destructive path of pursuing a campaign to eliminate Israel from what Hamas deems to be sacred Islamic land. This is the "occupation" Hamas "resists" no matter what the cost to its 1.8 million civilians.

Last summer, in the latest iteration of its "resistance," Hamas initiated another war against Israel by, among other things, launching scores of missiles, many from dense urban areas, indiscriminately into Israel. In an effort to stop the missiles, Israel targeted the launch sites and their command and control centres. Despite unprecedented precautions by Israel to avoid civilian casualties, hundreds of Gazans were killed and extensive damage was caused to homes and apartments – damage Hamas sought to showcase to the international community via the hundreds of foreign correspondents allowed into Gaza, by Israel, to cover the 50-day conflict.

Hamas' cynical, criminal tactics, including using its civilians as human shields, paid off handsomely: the longer the war went on, the greater the international reaction against Israel for "causing" a humanitarian crisis. Since not one of the hundreds of journalists reporting from Gaza showed a single missile being fired from there (even though according to an August 2014 Amnesty International report, between July 8 and Aug. 26, 4,881 rockets and 1,753 mortars were fired from that small territory), many in the West lost sight of the actual cause of the war, Hamas' missiles, and focused only on the effect, Israel's reaction.

In response to the approximately 100,000 Gazans left homeless, what has Hamas done? Instead of plans to rebuild destroyed homes for its people, Hamas brags only about building, with Iranian financial support and encouragement, new attack tunnels, 32 of which were discovered and destroyed by Israel during the war.

Con Coughlin, the defence editor of Britain's Daily Telegraph newspaper, reported last month that Iran was supplying Hamas with "tens of millions of dollars" to help rebuild its tunnel network, and is also funding Hamas with new missile supplies. At a time when battle lines are being drawn between Iranian-led Shia forces and Saudi-led Sunni forces in the wider region, the fact that Shia Iran is again supporting Sunni Hamas against Israel shows just how dominant the anti-Israel determination of both Hamas and Iran is, to say nothing of Iran's major Shia proxy, Hezbollah, on Israel's northern border.

If Iran, reportedly suffering under economic sanctions because of its illicit nuclear program, can fund Hamas and Hezbollah and, according to other sources, prop up Syrian president Bashar Assad with a billion dollars a month, just imagine how much more emboldened it will be this summer if it receives tens – possibly hundreds – of billions in sanctions relief following the signing of a U.S.-led nuclear agreement. ■

As this column goes to press, unconfirmed reports are circulating about indirect Israeli-Hamas contacts aimed at securing a three- to five-year ceasefire. We should soon find out if there's any validity to them.

Intermarriage is an opportunity, Oraynu speaker says

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Paul Golin says he, his Japanese wife and "half-breed" daughter are "Hitler's worst nightmare."

Jews today rarely practise Judaism in the same ways that their grandparents did, so why do people cling to the idea that their hypothetical grandchildren must carry out the same brand of Judaism as they do?

Paul Golin, associate executive director of the New York-based Jewish Outreach Institute, an independent organization that reaches out to unaffiliated and intermarried families and helps the organized Jewish community better welcome them, posed this question to the audience at his May 4 talk about reframing ideas on intermarriage.

Hosted by the Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, the event was titled "Intermarriage: Optimism and Opportunity" and was held at the University of Toronto Multi-Faith Centre, drawing about 75 people.

Golin's presentation stressed that rather than focusing on the fear that rising rates of intermarriage threaten Jewish continuity, as so many in the Jewish community across denominations do, Jews should be asking themselves "how we can show our Jewish kids and grandchildren that we value organized Judaism, not because we're afraid for its survival but because it brings us meaning?"

Golin began by sharing his personal experience of growing up and being told by his maternal grandmother, a Holocaust survivor, "If you marry someone non-Jewish, you'll be finishing Hitler's job."

Golin said that he "didn't buy this" from a young age, feeling that it clashed with the values he was learning about judging people as individuals and not according to their race or religion.

He eventually did marry a non-Jewish woman of Japanese origin, and the two have a son together, whom they raise to have a strong Jewish identity as well as a connection to his Japanese heritage.

"I actually think I'm living Hitler's worst nightmare," Golin joked. "I'm a free Jew, I'm married to a Japanese woman and we have a beautiful 'half-breed' – take that Hitler."

Though organized Judaism typically sees intermarriage and assimilation as part of a "continuity crisis," he said, they can be viewed through a more positive lens.

Jews in contemporary North America are "the most embraced, respected and powerful Jewish community the world has ever known," Golin maintained, and the idea that "we are being absorbed into a larger culture and becoming unrecognizable [as Jews]" is one he finds highly challenging.

"I feel both 100 per cent Jewish and 100 per cent American. I think you can be both – Canadian too – and that you don't have to choose. That's an amazing new thing for the Jewish community," he said.

Further, while intermarriage and other Jewish trends – such as a decreased sense of religiosity, diminished "ethnicity or tribalism" and the breakdown of "fixed Jewish denominational identities" – may change the way Judaism looks and is practised, it doesn't mean it will cease to exist.

Golin acknowledged that the 2013 Pew Research Center's Portrait of Jewish Americans caused something of a panic among much of the organized Jewish community for pointing to significant rates of intermarriage and assimilation, but he emphasized more optimistically that it also shows that "there are 6.7 million U.S. Jews right now, which is more than at any time in history."

For Golin, the "most damning number" in the report is that only 28 per cent of those surveyed ranked being part of a Jewish community as the thing that's essential to their Jewishness.

His organization works to counter this widespread sense of disconnect, he explained, "to understand the mindset of folks who don't see the value of being part of the Jewish community… and to show them the benefit of it."

While those who feel less connected are often those who have intermarried or are children of intermarried couples, Golin is optimistic that greater inclusiveness for mixed-faith couples and families and strong community outreach efforts can bring people back to organized Judaism – be it through religious, cultural or ancestral channels, or a combination of these elements.

Golin advised synagogues and other Jewish institutions that are interested in being more inclusive to explicitly say in their literature that "intermarried families are welcome," and to consider holding special programs for mixed-faith families.

"I also think it's important for us to have conversations about why we're maintaining certain boundaries," he said. "I would say [to institutions] to do an audit of all the boundaries you're maintaining and see which are authentic to who you are as Jews." ■

COR asks labour board to rescind compliance order

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB) has reserved judgment in a case that could re-open an issue over whether kosher supervisors, or mashgichim, can be considered management personnel exempt from overtime provisions of the Employment Standards Act (ESA).

Board chair Bernard Fishbein heard arguments last week from the Kashruth Council of Canada, which certifies kosher products under the COR label, and the Ministry of Labour's director of employment standards.

The Kashruth Council brought a motion asking the OLRB to rescind a March 5, 2014 compliance order by a Ministry of Labour officer that required the Kashruth Council to pay its mashgichim overtime pay. The Kashruth Council argued it should not be bound by the compliance order, because a June 17, 2013, OLRB decision found that mashgichim are part of the organization's management or supervisory team, making them exempt from the overtime pay requirements of the ESA.

Israel Balter, lawyer for the Kashruth Council, argued the director should be prevented from re-opening an issue that has already been decided.

But Katherine Ballweg, the director's lawyer, argued that the director was not present at the hearing that led to the June 2013 decision. That hearing was a one-sided presentation of the evidence and should not be relied upon by the OLRB, she said. Ballweg also argued that the ruling was specific to that case and should not affect the subsequent compliance order.

If the OLRB rejects the Kashruth Council's motion, a new hearing is likely, in which the status of mashgichim will be adjudicated.

The Kashruth Council has long argued that it pays its mashgichim beyond statutory requirements and offers greater flexibility in work hours than is required by law.

However, that hasn't stopped the Kashruth Council from being subject to labour proceedings involving its employees before. In 2012, an employment standards officer found that the Kashruth Council owed 58 employees more than $10,000 in overtime, vacation pay and other wages. The Kashruth Council settled with all the employees, except three, whom it paid about $140.

The Kashruth Council has argued that it is a religious organization and is exempt from the overtime provisions of the ESA.

A June 2013 OLRB decision, written by vice-chair Tanya Wacyk, recounted some of the legal proceedings involving the Kashruth Council. She noted that a hearing pitting the Kashruth Council against former mashgiach Morley Rand and the director of employment standards, had been split, with the first part held to determine whether the Kashruth Council was a holder of a "religious office" and so excluded from the provisions of the ESA. The OLRB ruled against the Kashruth Council in that part of the case, she stated.

Richard Rabkin

The second part of the case, which looked at whether the Kashruth Council's mashgichim are supervisory personnel, was held in the absence of the director of standards and of Rand, who gave notice he wouldn't attend. Rand had asked that Wacyk recuse herself from the case "on the basis of prejudice, personal bias and a lack of impartiality." Wacyk rejected Rand's request and heard the case.

Ballweg said she didn't know why the director didn't take part in the second part of the hearing. With the Kashruth Council the only party in attendance and giving evidence, Wacyk found that Rand "performed work of a supervisory or managerial character and that pursuant to [ESA regulations] he was not entitled to overtime pay."

In a statement provided to The CJN by managing director Richard Rabkin, the Kashruth Council said: "Our mashgichim are the lifeblood of our organization… This is why COR pays our mashgichim overtime, and our overtime practices have been found by the Ontario Ministry of Labour to be 'a greater right or benefit to the employees under the provisions of the act.'

"By treating mashgichim as 'supervisors'… mashgichim have more flexibility to work additional hours if they so choose, thereby earning more money. Our method of overtime payment, which has been recognized by the board as more generous than the minimum guidelines set out in the statute, is better for our mashgichim, for our caterers, and for kosher consumers." ■

Film fest revises ad policy after Israeli flag complaints

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Jonathan Lerner

Shana Myara

The Vancouver Queer Film Festival has revised its sponsorship and advertising policy after being criticized for accepting an ad that included an Israeli flag.

The VQFF came under fire last summer for an advertisement by Yad b'Yad, a Vancouver-based group that supports the Jewish LGBTQ community. The ad, which appeared in a printed festival guidebook, depicted an Israeli flag alongside a pride flag and was congratulating VQFF on its 26th anniversary.

Out on Screen, which runs the Aug. 13-23 festival, announced a revision of its policy in an open letter to the community last month. "The issue that is of paramount importance to some members of our community is the festival's stance on Israel," the April 23 letter said. "There has been incredible and polarized debate regarding our choices when we've presented queer Israeli film, or when we've published advertising from a local group that presents the Israeli flag alongside a Pride flag."

The organization's policy now prohibits advertisements depicting "overt expressions of nationalism," including flags. The VQFF also says it will refuse funding from foreign governments, consulates or embassies, except for filmmakers' travel expenses.

The revised policy was a direct response to accusations of "pinkwashing" levelled against the VQFF for its inclusion of the Yad b'Yad ad last year. Three filmmakers withdrew their films from the festival, and they and other protesters criticized the festival for trying to distract attention from the plight of Palestinians in Israel by focusing instead on Israel's gay rights record. They demanded that the festival apologize for the ad, develop a "pinkwashing" policy and join the BDS campaign against Israel.

In its revised policy, Out on Screen refused to join the BDS movement, but said it would follow its own "anti-oppression framework" to determine its advertising and sponsorship policies and film curation.

Jonathan Lerner, spokesperson for Yad b'Yad, said his organization was deeply disappointed by the policy changes. "This prevents any nationality from expressing its own identity and support for the Queer Film Festival and curtails all national groups from demonstrating their country's pride for the LGBTQ community," he said.

"This is a policy of institutionalized censorship that does little to promote inclusivity, diversity and understanding and is contrary to the broad values expressed by LGBTQ communities in Canada and around the world."

Last year, Yad b'Yad was among a few religious and ethnic sponsors listed in the program. Others were Salaam: Queer Muslim Community of Canada and the South Asian Film Education Society. At the time, Lerner said the VQFF took the unprecedented step of donating Yad b'Yad's advertising fee to a third party. "They publicly stated they would not accept our money, and we were the only group treated as such," he said.

Since last August, he added, Yad b'Yad and Vancouver's Jewish community leadership have tried to engage the VQFF in dialogue to resolve this matter. "Each and every attempt was rejected and dismissed," he said.

As a result of the revised policy, only Israeli filmmakers who demonstrate "critical dialogues about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Israeli occupation" will be allowed to contribute to the festival, he noted.

"The VQFF has proactively and very publicly weighed into the Arab-Israeli conflict," Lerner said. "Its specific policies are aimed at silencing proud supporters of the LGBTQ community and of Israel, all while remaining silent on the plight of gays and lesbians in places such as Iran, Syria, China and even the Palestinian Authority. One can only judge the VQFF by its very public actions and obvious inactions."

Shana Myara, director of festival programming for Out on Screen, said in a statement to The CJN that the organization's "role in convening dialogue is not always easy, but it is essential. This process has enabled us to reflect on and clarify how we step up in ways to make space for everyone, and to curate with an eye towards those most often erased from the mainstream."

She added: "We now have stronger policies that will enable us to make sure all our partnerships reflect our values and allow us to focus on bringing people together through film – to put artists and their work forward to advance a more open, inclusive society."

She said the only funding the VQFF has received from consular sources was from the German Consulate, which gave less than $1,000 for its German film screenings. ■

Jewish war vets honoured 70 years after end of WWII

SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Eugene Kats looked very distinguished in his side cap and navy blazer, which was pinned with dozens of military medals.

Kats, 90, fought with the Polish resistance until 1944, when the partisans were absorbed by the Red Army. He was in the heavy gun division and part of the Soviet force that drove the Germans out of Russia.

Arkadiy Novokolsky, 93, was an engineer and pilot in the Russian air force. He developed a night-vision camera for reconnaissance work and flew missions to test the equipment.

Valentin Rabinovich, 93, fought in the anti-aircraft artillery corps of the Red Army and helped to break the siege of Leningrad, which lasted from September 1941 to January 1944.

Kats, Novokolsky and Rabinovich were among the Jewish veterans who were honoured May 8 at a celebration marking the 70th anniversary of VE Day, when Nazi Germany surrendered to Allied forces in Europe.

About 200 people gathered at the National Restaurant and Banquet Hall for this community event, which was an opportunity to highlight the contribution of Jewish veterans from the former Soviet Union, all of whom are members of the group Jewish War Veterans of Canada. Speakers included MPP Monte Kwinter, former city counsellor Norm Gardner, University of Toronto professor Anna Shternshis and entrepreneur Marat Ressin.

Shternshis noted that Jewish soldiers played a vital role in the fight against the Nazis. Of the 1.5 million Jewish soldiers who fought in the war, 550,000 were American and another third or 500,000 were in the Soviet Armed Forces. "Some of the soldiers who fought against fascism are here in this room."

She said that many Soviet Jews who served were over-represented in the infantry, where they were very vulnerable. Many of these Jewish infantrymen were killed.

However, Shternshis pointed out that Ukrainian Jewish infantrymen had a higher survival rate than their mothers, because Jewish civilians were targeted and killed by the Nazis. "Less than one per cent of the Jewish civilians who stayed in Ukraine survived war."

Kwinter stressed the importance of remembering the history of the war and the ultimate sacrifice made by so many soldiers. "Victory came at a high cost."

The evening's lead sponsor, the Steinberg/Brody family, provided funding in honour of the Soviet Jewish veterans.

Elen Steinberg, a philanthropist and entrepreneur, is also the founder of SovietJewishVeterans.com, a website that documents the individual histories of the Russian Jewish veterans who came to Canada.

She started the project in 2010 because there was so little information about Jewish World War II vets who had served in the Soviet Armed Forces.

Steinberg said she felt an urgency about moving forward on the project quickly because of the advanced age of the veterans. "I thought if not now, then when? We have to do something now to remember them. We're running out of time."

She did fundraising and also got money from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, so she was able to proceed with the website, which today has more than 60 stories, complete with subtitles in English.

Stacey and David Cynamon, were also key supporters of the evening as were Renee and Ralph Wolfe. The Wolfes sponsored the evening's entertainment in memory of Renee's mother, Nina Goldstein. She was honoured by the Soviet government for helping children during the siege of Leningrad. Her story can also be found on SovietJewishVeterans.com ■

The legacy of Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

A great rabbi was walking into the beit midrash, the study hall, when he heard a pay phone ring near the entry way. He stopped to answer the phone, and heard the voice of a young woman on the other end. The rabbi asked how he could be of help. She requested that he retrieve her boyfriend from the study hall, and the great rabbi – the academy head – obligingly sought out the young man in the study hall and informed him that he had received a phone call.

Stunned that his rosh yeshiva had taken time out of his busy schedule for this phone call, the young man sheepishly went outside and picked up the receiver. His girlfriend said hello, and asked him, "Who was the nice man named Aharon who spoke to me on the phone?"

Indeed, who was this great scholar and saint, Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein?

Stories like this one have been spreading through Israeli and North American Jewish media in the weeks since Rabbi Lichtenstein passed away at the end of April. These stories rarely describe his stunning erudition, deep faith and masterful scholarship. Instead they portray a person of fine character and humble demeanour.

Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein was born in Paris in 1933. He escaped with his family to the United States before World War II, where he studied in Yeshiva Chaim Berlin under Rabbi Yitchok Hutner and later under Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik and his brother Rabbi Yosef Dov Soloveitchik at Yeshiva University.

From a young age, Rabbi Lichtenstein was recognized as both a genius and an amazingly diligent student, as he quickly grew to prominence within the modern Orthodox community. After earning a PhD in English literature from Harvard University in 1962, Rabbi Lichtenstein served as a rosh yeshiva at Yeshiva University. In 1971, he answered the call of Rabbi Yehuda Amital to join him at the helm of Yeshivat Har Etzion, near Jerusalem. There, he taught and mentored thousands of students, authored hundreds of publications, and became the standard bearer for a vision of Judaism that engaged the complexities of modern life while remaining firmly rooted in Torah. Last year, Rabbi Lichtenstein received the Israel Prize, Israel's highest civilian honour, for Jewish religious literature.

But back to the stories.

One year during tikkun layl shavuot the all-night study session to celebrate the giving of the Torah – Rabbi Lichtenstein disappeared from the beit midrash. The students continued their learning, when suddenly they heard the voice of their teacher. They looked around but could not see him. No one knew where his voice was coming from. They students searched out and eventually found Rabbi Lichtenstein in the balcony, delivering a personal class to his daughter, Estee.

Here's another: A young Rabbi Lichtenstein was once playing basketball with his students when he suddenly stopped the game and said that he would not play anymore. The boys, he argued, were not playing ethically. When one of them asked what ethics has to do with basketball, he explained that if everyone did not put their heart into the game – working hard on defence and offence – then they were compromising on how the game should be played.

These stories, and many more like them, tell us something important about Rabbi Lichtenstein, and about the Torah and the Jewish People. They reveal that such fine personalities still walk this earth. They expose a Torah that is still capable of honing a man's character and generating unique human goodness. The stories show us that the genes and the culture that produced men like Rabbi Akiva still operate among us.

In an era such as our own, when so much cynicism surrounds authority figures, these stories are essential. They teach us that great men can still be good men. ■

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler is the rabbi of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

IS A LAWYER NECESSARY IF ONE OF US IS KEEPING THE HOUSE?

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 33 years

Question: I have been married for 33 years. My husband and I are on the verge of divorce. We have a house worth about $280,000. We do not wish to sell it after the divorce, one of us will keep it on mutual understanding. Do we have to see a lawyer? If not, how do I go about this?

Answer: Should you see a lawyer? Does it snow in Calgary?

You should both see a lawyer if for no other reason than to draft the legal documentation to transfer one spouse's interest to the other and to ensure the transfer is properly registered with the government Land Registry Office. If one spouse is assuming the mortgage on the property entirely, the spouse who is transferring his/her interest should make sure that the transferor is being completely removed from the mortgage in case of a future fault. The lawyer will ensure that happens. It is best if the spouse staying in the home pays out the old mortgage by replacing it with a new one. However, before anything happens, unless that lawyer is knowledgeable about family law and can serve as a mediator, you should both obtain independent legal advice to ensure that an even split is appropriate. Even then, both of you will require two independent legal advice certificates before signing anything. If the home is the only asset, then at the very least the law recognizes that the fair market value incorporates notional costs of disposition, such as four to six percent in real estate commissions and $750-$1250 in lawyer's fees when the property is actually sold to a third party. But since the property is not actually being sold to a third party, lawyers normally agree to discount the market value of such notional costs of disposition once you and your spouse have agreed upon the figure.

Secondly, in many cases, after such a lengthy marriage it would not be unusual to divide the equity in such a home unequally. After 33 years your husband may have accumulated a net worth that could include the value of an interest in a profitable business, a large private government pension, substantial RRSP's, significant real estate holdings and cash in accounts or securities that he acquired or that grew substantially during the course of the marriage. As a result, you may possibly be entitled to equalization payments to cover the difference between the increase in his net worth and yours. Accordingly, it may not be so simple as to split up the net proceeds before calculating how much he might owe you as a result of the marriage under Ontario family law.

You would be well advised to consult a competent family law lawyer.

A night of fashion helps give cardiac care to kids

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

It costs $10,000 to save a child's life, said Marni Brinder Byk, the new executive director of Save a Child's Heart (SACH) Canada, at a May 5 fashion fundraiser.

The event was the first event of its kind for the Israeli charity's Canadian branch, which works to raise awareness and funds to enable its Israeli partner organization to provide free, life-saving cardiac surgery to children from developing countries.

SACH also trains surgeons and medical professionals from developing nations so that they will one day have the knowledge and skills to establish independent treatment centres in their countries.

"A Night of Fashion from the Heart," held at Holt Renfrew on Bloor Street and hosted in collaboration with Holt Renfrew, included an in-store dessert reception, speakers from SACH in Israel, a mini-fashion show and an opportunity for attendees to shop at a number of the Holt Renfrew's luxury boutiques, including Gucci and Chanel.

With 10 per cent of profits from the evening's shopping going to SACH, Brinder Byk said that although final sales numbers were still undetermined, the event met its goal to bring in at least $100,000 in sales, which would enable it to fund at least one surgery.

"Ten percent of $100,000... covers the cost of bringing a child and their parent or guardian to Israel, including flights and accommodation, as well as the cost of care. With every $10,000, we can save the life of a child – that's our magic number," she said.

About 200 people – mostly women – mingled and sampled wine and hors d'oeuvres in the mezzanine of the store's shoe department before opening remarks by Holt Renfrew vice-president James Watt, SACH Foundation vice-chair Riva Grinshpan and Brinder Byk.

Brinder Byk then introduced guest speakers Dr. Hagi Dekel, an Israeli pediatric cardiac surgeon from SACH; Dr. Yayu Mekonnen, an Ethiopian pediatric cardiac surgeon at SACH, and Fatima Sarsour, the co-ordinator and translator for Palestinian and Arab-speaking families at SACH.

Mekonnen, who has been in Israel for the past three years on a fellowship at SACH, will, when he returns to Ethiopia, be the very first pediatric heart surgeon in the country.

"Ethiopia is a big country population-wise, but we've never had a pediatric heart surgeon before, so anyone who needs cardiac surgery has to go abroad if they can pay for it. And if they can't, it's very sad," he said.

He noted that SACH does open heart surgery for about 200 patients a year and other interventional procedures for about 50 patients a year, and stressed the importance of supporting SACH.

"It doesn't matter where you come from. Kids are the future of the world. What brought everyone together tonight is kids."

Sarsour, who lives in Israel in the Arab town of Kfar Kassam, has worked at SACH for the past seven years.

She has no reservations about working for an Israeli organization, she said

"I know for some people, who don't know about the complicated reality we live in, it sounds weird for an Arab girl to live in Israel, but no, we live together. I have many Jewish friends. I studied at Tel Aviv University. I have many Jewish friends at work," she said.

Sarsour said she has seen mutual understanding develop between Israeli and Palestinian parents of SACH patients. According to the organization's website, nearly half of all children treated by SACH come from the Palestinian Authority, and more than 1,500 Palestinian children have undergone open heart surgery there since SACH's founding "Palestinian families often have to come through borders and need permits to come to Israel. They usually don't have relatives who can come to the hospital. They are alone," she said. "Sometimes I see co-operation between Israeli and Palestinian parents. A Palestinian family will say, 'My Israeli neighbour helped me watch my baby while I went to eat.' Despite the complicated reality we live in, I see this co-operation. There is still some hope."

The presentation concluded with six young women, all current or past SACH volunteers, modelling Holt Renfrew outfits. ■

Toronto couple returns from Nepal after earthquake

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Toronto residents Yaacov Ben-Israel and Judy Rosenberg Ben-Israel returned April 30 from nearly two weeks in Nepal feeling extremely fortunate.

The couple, both in their 60s and both chiropractors, found themselves caught in the April 25 earthquake that devastated the country as they made their way back from a six-day trek in the Himalayas to the city of Kathmandu.

Though left physically unscathed by the earthquake, which registered 7.8 on the Richter scale and has killed more than 7,000 people to date, the Ben-Israels witnessed some of the destruction, chaos and human suffering that ensued.

"We were left intact, healthy and not injured in any way, but so many Nepalese lost their lives, relatives, houses, properties, so I feel very fortunate," Yaacov, who is originally from Israel, told The CJN a day after he and his wife had returned to Toronto.

Accompanied by a local guide and a porter, the Ben-Israels had stopped in an area just southwest of Kathmandu to eat lunch at a roadside restaurant that Yaacov described as "a four- or five-storey building on the slope of a very steep mountain," when the building began shaking violently.

Thinking that the building itself was the problem, they retreated to the road. "It wasn't the building that was the problem, it was the whole ground," Yaacov said. "We saw dust rising on the mountains and houses collapse... It was unbelievable. There was nothing you could do."

The shaking stopped and they got into their guide's Jeep to drive toward the city. Along the way, they were stopped by people asking them to take others who had been injured to the hospital.

Yaacov and Judy Ben-Israel on the morning of the last day of their six-day Himalayan trek, before the earthquake struck.

They did so, and Yaacov described the scene at the hospital as "unbelievable... people were outside in a field on stretchers... doctors were doing triage right there in the field."

They reached Kathmandu and began walking to their hotel in the neighbourhood of Thamel, a tourist centre, on foot.

They found their hotel badly damaged, with "plaster falling all over the place," and decided they didn't feel safe sleeping there, particularly since the Nepalese government was encouraging people to sleep in the streets while the country was being hit by aftershocks.

The Ben-Israels opted to stay instead at the Chabad House several hundred metres from their hotel. The Chabad compound was made up of a few low buildings located in an open yard that Yaacov said looked fairly strong and could easily be exited.

There they found themselves among hundreds of other people, mainly Israeli travellers and "other Jewish people."

That evening, Yaacov said, someone from the Israeli Consulate came and invited people to stay at the consulate. About half of the people moved, but the Ben-Israels stayed.

They and their fellow guests were given dinner and water by the Chabad rabbi and rebbetzin, who also made Havdalah.

"I'm not sure where they pulled all the food from. They fed everyone. No one went hungry. They pulled matzoh from their storage, fresh vegetables for salad, made cholent," Yaacov marvelled.

The next day, with their flight out of the country scheduled to depart at 9 p.m. but no Internet or phone connection to determine if the airport was open, the Ben-Israels retrieved their luggage from the hotel, which had been further damaged by a second earthquake the night before.

Walking through the city, where most stores and restaurants were closed, it was apparent that food was scarce, Yaacov said.

"Vendors were doubling, tripling and quadrupling their prices – it didn't make a difference to us, but for a Nepalese local who had to go from paying [the equivalent of] 25 cents to over a dollar, they often couldn't afford it."

They eventually made their way to the airport – which was "a zoo" – and discovered their flight was delayed until the following day, so they spent night in the lobby of an airport hotel, which Yaacov said, "was full of all kinds of people – nobody wanted to stay in the rooms."

They were finally able to fly to Kuala Lumpur the next day, and, after spending two days in Bangkok, they returned to Canada.

Reflecting on their experiences, Yaacov said they never felt afraid, and although they took precautions, they "didn't panic."

He said their thoughts are with the Nepalese.

"I saw people being pulled out of the rubble, some dead, some alive... You could really see the suffering and anxiety of the people."

He added that the Nepalese deeply depend on tourism, "and I don't know how many tourists will be going to Nepal for the next little while... I think we need to assist these poor people."

After seeing first hand the work being done by the rabbi and his wife, he has decided to donate money directly to Chabad.

"I saw them operate beautifully, so calm, cool, collected and supportive, taking care of so many people," he said. ■

The Claire Friedlander Family Foundation

The Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity, along with partner Henry Schein Cares, launched a program in early 2015 to treat the oral health needs of Holocaust Survivors who cannot afford dental care.

TORONTO WAS SELECTED AS ONE OF THE TREATMENT CITIES.

New Patients in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) are now being accepted into the Program through the Jewish Family & Child Agency (JF&CS).

PROGRAM REQUIREMENTS FOR POTENTIAL PATIENTS:

- Must be a current client of JF&CS.
- Must be a Holocaust Survivor (as defined by the Claims Conference).
- Must meet the income and patient eligibility requirements.
- Must not currently be receiving dental treatment in the GTA.

PROGRAM DENTISTS:

- Participating dentists are members of Alpha Omega.
- Participating dentists practice in the GTA.
- Participating dentists represent a variety of dental specialties, including general, endodontics, oral surgery, and periodontics.

Manitoba city twins with Israeli regional council

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

The central Manitoba city of Portage La Prairie and the communities that constitute the Valley of Springs Regional Council, Mo'atza Azorit Bik'at Beit She'an, in northern Israel's Beit She'an Valley are now twinned communities.

The official sister city partnership agreements were signed May 1, with simultaneous signing ceremonies in Portage and in the Valley of Springs.

Portage La Prairie is a city of some 13,000, about a 45-minute drive west of Winnipeg on the TransCanada Highway. The Valley of the Springs council is bounded by the Jezreel Valley in the west, the Lower Galilee in the north, the Jordan River in the east and the Jordan Valley and Samarian hills in the south. About 9,700 people live in the 16 kibbutzim and six moshavim in its municipal territory. The city of Beit She'an lies in the centre of the territory, but is an independent municipality.

"Our two regions have a lot in common," Portage Mayor Irvin Ferris said. "We both have an economy based largely on agricultural and food processing. We both have a food development centre. We are looking forward to technological exchanges related to agricultural as well as increased trade and perhaps some tourism. Also, perhaps schools in both places can get involved so children here and in Israel can learn about each other's culture."

Ferris said the shidduch between the two communities was arranged by Daniel Shindleman, a former resident of Portage La Prairie whose Winnipeg-based brothers, Sandy and Robert, are among Western Canada's leading property developers. The Shindleman family are also prominent philanthropists who have contributed greatly to their former home town.

Daniel Shindleman himself lives in Zurich, Switzerland, where he is director of Bridgemer Investment Properties Ltd., a Canadian-Swiss group that provides investment and financial advisory services to families and companies.

"We focus on agriculture, infrastructure and real estate, in Canada and globally." "As part of our search for new technologies to help agriculture, from seed to post-harvest, I have been making trips to Israel to meet innovative agri-tech businesses," he added. "These include startups as well as research institutes."

Signing the sister city agreement between Portage La Prairie, Man., and the Valley of Springs Regional Council in northern Israel, at the Canadian Embassy in Israel on May 1, are, from left, Zion Daco (behind), managing director of the Eden Research Station; Daniel Shindleman, president of the Bridgemer Group; Vivian Bercovici, Canada's ambassador in Israel; and Yoram Karin, mayor of the Valley of Springs council.

He said Bridgemer bridges the gap between idea and on-the-ground implementation of new technologies to improve the quality and quantity of agricultural production in a sustainable manner that does not impair the world's limited resources."We arrange field trials and do other work to have these innovations put in service. It is part of our agricultural investment program."

As part of his search for innovation in agriculture, Shindleman visited the Valley of Springs, including the Eden Agricultural Research Station, located there in early January 2015.

"When I was there, I realized how I felt at home," he said. "I looked around and saw field crops similar to what one sees on the Canadian prairies. And, in particular, it reminded me of my hometown. A sister city pairing made clear sense to me. Portage la Prairie in Manitoba, and Valley of Springs in Israel are prime agricultural centres, have significant nearby waterfowl and other bird populations, offer eco-tourism, and complement each other.

"Their respective advantages in agriculture can be applied jointly to pursue global goals of food security and expansion of markets. It is an innovation partnership to realize global potential. I am very excited about what can be done, and I am very happy to be a part of pursuing that potential. Portage has the land and skilled farmers. Valley of Springs has innovation and skilled agri-scientists. It's a great combination."

Although he left Canada in 1991, Shindleman notes, he still comes back regularly every year and always visits his hometown. ■

Get ready for French exodus, U.S. journalist says

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.com, MONTREAL

World Jewry, and in particular the Montreal Jewish community, has to be prepared for a possible exodus of Jews from France, says American journalist and author Jeffrey Goldberg, who is deeply concerned about worsening anti-Semitism in Europe.

While Israel has been the destination for thousands of Jews already leaving France, Goldberg indicated Israel is not for everyone.

"Is it time for Jews to leave? I never want to tell any Jew where they should live, but the international Jewish community has to be prepared if the time comes when it is better they get out," said Goldberg, a staff writer for the Atlantic since 2007, specializing in the Middle East, who used to live in Israel.

He was guest speaker at a Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University gala dinner May 3 where businessman and philanthropist Alvin Segal was presented with the Mount Scopus Award, the organization's highest citation.

Goldberg continued: "Montreal is on the frontlines... A lot of French Jews may seek a haven here." France has the third-largest Jewish population in the world, with 500,000.

Europe, in total, has 1.3 million Jews, he noted.

"We have to be ready to help our brethren if they might need it in a dire and quick way," he said.

Goldberg said the situation for Jews in Europe is "deteriorating with every passing month... We are seeing something we never thought we would see again [after World War II]... Jewish people can't afford to make believe the world is something it's not."

Anti-Semitism has worsened in Europe over the past 15 years and soared in the last two or three, he said. "A virus that we thought had died has just changed shape."

What makes it especially dangerous, he thinks, is that this hatred represents the convergence of three strands: the classical canard of alleged Jewish power of the far right, the anti-Zionism of the far left, which seeks the elimination of the State of Israel, and that found in the Muslim and Arab worlds.

"Angry, disenfranchised Muslim immigrants" are responsible for most of violent anti-Semitism, but can't, he believes, be separated from the larger phenomenon.

What makes today different from the 1930s is that European political leaders are staunchly outspoken against anti-Semitism, foremost among them being German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

In contrast, North American Jews have never been "so at home, so assertive about their rights, or more enfranchised. We are more in control of their destiny than any time in our history," he said.

Segal is chair and chief executive officer of Peerless Clothing Inc., the largest supplier of men's fine tailored clothing in North America.

He played a key role in negotiations in the 1980s leading to the North American Free Trade Agreement, a fact attested to in a videotaped message from former prime minister Brian Mulroney.

"Alvin was on the frontlines of the battle... He felt it would be great for Peerless and great for Canada, and he was right on both counts."

With the U.S. market opened, Peerless rapidly grew from a small company serving a domestic clientele into an "empire," in the words of Lewis Dobrin, who delivered the homage.

Segal is also an exemplary donor, contributing $20 million in 2004 to the Jewish General Hospital for the creation of the Segal Cancer Centre, and millions over the years to the Segal Centre for Performing Arts, a devotion that grew out of his love of Yiddish theatre.

Despite his prominence, Segal was lauded for his humility, quirky sense of humour, and for being his own man. The tribute video was titled Alvin Segal: The Enigma.

He did not seem destined for such success. The Albany, N.Y., native's father died when he was seven. He was a poor student, and stuttered.

His widowed mother remarried Montrealer Moe Segal when he was 16, and the family moved there. Alvin changed his name from Cramer to Segal.

Alvin Segal, centre, is presented with the Mount Scopus Award by Hebrew University president Menahem Ben-Sasson, left, and dinner chair Ari Brojde, president of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, Montreal Chapter.

He never finished high school, but went straight to work in the clothing factory and immediately found an environment that suited him. Peerless is essentially the only job he's ever had.

In business, he has been a maverick, Dobrin said, unafraid of change and risk.

As a person, he is unassuming and always smiling. "Alvin is a real mensch, a decent, upright, honourable human being."

In keeping with that self-effacement Segal had his wife, Emmelie, read his words of appreciation.

Proceeds from the dinner benefit two programs at Hebrew University: brain research at the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada and Revivim, a Jewish studies teacher training program.

Among the dignitaries at the evening, held at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, were Hebrew University president Menahem Ben-Sasson, McGill University principal Suzanne Fortier, Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre and executive committee member responsible for culture, Manon Gauthier, former Segal Centre executive director.

Segal's two siblings, Harriet Lazare of Montreal and Connie Solomon of Israel – two major influences in his life – were also present. ■

Cemeteries grapple with interfaith burial issue

lsarick@thecjn.ca

When Adam Dean's parents died within a year of each other, there was no question that they would be buried together, and in a Jewish cemetery.

"They were the most in love people you could imagine. They had to be buried together," said Dean.

Their faith in Judaism was a very big sustaining part of their life." It shaped the friends they made, their activities, their values and the way they raised their children, he said.

Being buried in a Jewish cemetery was absolutely everything to them. There would have been no other suitable choice period."

The couple had belonged to Toronto's Temple Sinai since 1980 and raised their children as Jews, but Adam's father had never converted to Judaism.

Until recently, the couple's desire to be buried together in a Jewish cemetery in Toronto would have been impossible to fulfil. The city's largest communal Jewish cemeteries, Pardes Shalom and Pardes Chaim operated by Toronto Hebrew Memorial Parks (THMP), do not permit the burial of non-Jews, including spouses, said executive director Howard Mammon.

That restriction is in THMP's bylaws. "Our rules allow us to only bury Jews. Unless there is a change to our bylaws, that will continue to be our policy."

Mammon said many of THMP's constituent groups — synagogues, temples and burial societies – are small "c" conservative, especially compared to their American counterparts, and many are not eager to see a change. "A large part of our membership wants the status quo," he added.

Changing the burial practice would also breach the trust place in THMP by those people already buried in the cemeteries, who expected to be interred in an exclusively Jewish cemetery, he added.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which appoints seven of the members on THMP's 14-member board, studied the issue last year, meeting with rabbis from across denominations and with funeral homes, said Jeff Springer, senior vice-president for corporate affairs.

Lambton Mills Cemetery was purchased by Temple Sinai specifically for interfaith families affiliated with the Jewish community. WIKIPEDIA

The question of interfaith burials raises a number of issues. Even if all the proper halachic preparations are made – for instance, providing gates and separate entrances – there is the question of the expectations of families who have already buried loved ones in the cemeteries, Springer said.

In the end, with no unanimity to be found, the federation decided to maintain the status quo and re-examine the issue in a few years. While the numbers of people who are currently looking for interfaith burial plots are not high at the moment, it's certainly an issue that will become more pressing 20 years from now.

"It's on the communal radar," Springer said.

Both the Conservative and Reform movements have ruled that non-Jewish partners may be buried in a Jewish cemetery. The Conservative movement's decision in 2010 specified that the interfaith section be separated from the rest of the cemetery by a small road. Both movements specify that only Jewish ceremonies are to be performed and that monuments cannot have symbols of other faiths.

Six years ago, Temple Sinai purchased a section of the Lambton Hills Jewish cemetery specifically for interfaith families who were affiliated with the Jewish community.

"If you've invested in our community, then our synagogue says we're going to invest in you. We're going to provide you the same level of choice any other family would have," says Rabbi Michael Dolgin.

It took several years for the cemetery to be licensed, and Adam Dean's mother was among the first to be buried in the new section in 2013.

"Creating the section allows for a much more compelling and sustainable form of Judaism," Dean said. " It allows for the commitment people make when they're married, to continue on after death."

Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Congregation, the largest Conservative synagogue in Western Canada, made a similar decision a few years ago and dedicated a small section of its cemetery to interfaith burials. The section has its own entrance and is surrounded by a fence, but "you don't feel it's violating any esthetic standards," said Rabbi Allan Green.

"These days there isn't a family without an intermarriage," said Rabbi Green. "We want to facilitate as much Jewish ritual as we can."

About 50 out of the 900 families who are members of Shaarey Zedek are intermarried, but the intermarriage rate for young Jews in the community is as high as 70 per cent, Rabbi Green said. "I have the feeling we're on the leading edge of this."

This approach to interfaith burials is not shared by all Conservative rabbis.

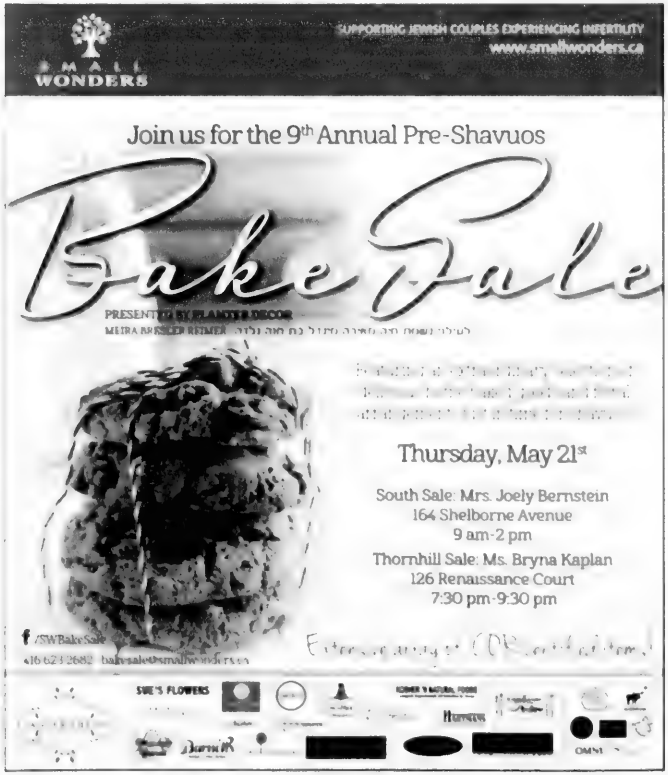
Rabbi Jarrod Grover, of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, argues that reserving burial in a Jewish cemetery for Jewish couples is one of the few restrictions Conservative Judaism can still impose. And in some cases, it may be enough to nudge a non-Jewish spouse who has long affiliated with the community to consider conversion.

"This remains the only standard the community has in an age of intermarriage," Rabbi Grover said. "I have seen cases where couples re-evaluated conversion because of this."

In Toronto, intermarried couples can be buried together in a non-denominational cemetery, he said.

Rabbi Grover said he is one of the few Conservative rabbis in the city who will officiate for a Jewish spouse in these circumstances.

"We honour the dead. I don't leave people to keep calling until you find someone to officiate." ■



Cremation remains sensitive topic in community

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

Cremation may be the final taboo for Jews. Most branches of Judaism discourage or forbid it, but even in denominations where it is encouraged, Canadian Jews overwhelmingly prefer to be buried in the ground.

Part of the abhorrence of cremation stems from the Holocaust and the Nazis' crematoria, where thousands of Jews perished.

"There's an acute sensitivity to this, post-Shoah, that changes the emotional tenor" of the discussion about burial options, said Rabbi Debra Landsberg, who serves as the rabbi at Temple Emanu-El and is chairperson of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto.

Even among unaffiliated Jews, tradition still holds sway when it comes to burials, said Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, executive director for Mercaz Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism.

A Conservative rabbi for more than 20 years, she says she has never been asked to officiate at a funeral involving cremation. "We do a lot of funerals from people who aren't members of a congregation, and among those people, primarily they feel [burial] is the way Jews do death."

Jewish death practices hold that respect for the body is paramount, with an emphasis on burial as soon as possible. Cremation is seen by the Conservative movement as contravening the value of honouring the dead, she said.

Although the practice is not acceptable, some rabbis will officiate at a funeral before a cremation has occurred.

For the Reform movement, the answer is similar. Cremation is discouraged and not part of accepted traditional practice, says Rabbi Landsberg. Rabbis will conduct funeral services before the cremation, rather than send the family away from the Jewish community altogether, but in practice it rarely happens.

In Calgary, Reform Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman, sees cremation as a personal choice, although it is rarely exercised in his congregation.

"Reform prides itself on autonomy and personal choice," he says. While historically Jews have chosen burial, "some people for many different reasons do not want a traditional burial."

The few Jews who have chosen cremation, however, tend to want their remains interred, he said.

While many Jewish cemeteries do not permit the interment of cremated remains, his congregation, Temple B'nai Tikvah, has its own cemetery where cremated remains can be interred.

Toronto Hebrew Memorial Parks, which administers the two largest Jewish cemeteries in the GTA, Pardes Shalom and Pardes Chaim, does not permit cremated remains to be buried or scattered on its premises, said executive director Howard Mammon.

Even in the most liberal reaches of Judaism, where cremation is seen as a valid choice, few Jews choose it as an option.

"We're very pro-cremation, but the majority of our members prefer to be buried," said Rabbi Eva Goldfinger, life-cycles director at Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

From an ethical point of view, cremation is a valid choice, since it leaves more available for the living, she said.

"We don't have a religious position on it [cremation], we have an ethical and a choice position on it."

Oraynu has purchased a section of a non-denominational cemetery where it does traditional burials for members. Cremated remains can also be interred and the individual can be memorialized with a stone or a marker, Rabbi Goldfinger said. ■

Pre-arranging burial fees is a wise strategy

Families of deceased should anticipate fees including $900 in vehicle charges (which includes transportation of the deceased, registering a death at city hall, picking up the chevra kadisha and the provision of a funeral hearse for the cemetery), facility charges of $2,000, staffing charges of $2,000, chevra kadisha fees ($385 for taharah and $230 per calendar day for a shomer) and cemetery fees for digging, which range between $800 and $1,600 depending on the cemetery. And all fees are subject to HST.

Some 40 per cent of families have pre-arranged their burial fees, Benjamin said, a strategy that makes sense if you're planning a decade or two ahead of your death. "When you buy now, you get the prices at today's price, so for someone who makes the purchase when they're between 40 and 60, they could be saving several years of inflation," he explained.

For families that can't afford burial fees, or in the case of deceased individuals with no next of kin and no funds, Benjamin's has arrangements with local municipalities whereby they cover one-third of the burial costs and the memorial chapel covers the remainder.

The fees are similar at Steeles Memorial Chapel in Thornhill, north of Toronto, a 70-year-old community-run business. Anticipate chapel staff and funeral director services of $2,225, $525 for facilities to prepare and shelter the deceased, vehicle services at $825 (including hearse and transportation), documentation fees of $280 and the costs of casket ($965 up to $3,995), burial plot and cemetery fees. Don't forget taharah, the shomer, a tallit, the burial shroud and the cost of having a rabbi and/or cantor at the funeral.

When it comes to caskets, choices vary depending on where you are and whose services you use.

At the Schara Tzedeck Cemetery in Vancouver, there's only one type of kosher casket available, and it costs $480.

Where there is a range of options, casket costs vary depending on the wood used to create the casket, the workmanship involved, the finish and the colour. At the Star of David Memorial Chapels in New York, for example, halachically acceptable (all-wood) caskets range in price from $895 (US) for the most basic pine box, up to $11,995 for an African ribbon grain mahogany version – which has been designed "with rounded corners and a flat top foot end, giving it a majestic appearance."

At Benjamin's in Toronto, made-in-Canada caskets start at $800 and go up to $35,000. The choice for Jews is more limited at Canadian casket retailers such as Casket Outlet in Toronto and Montreal, and Casket Depot in Scarborough, Ont. Both companies retail a poplar casket that complies with Jewish law for $1,290. At Casket Canada, an online, Calgary-based distributor, a matte finish, poplar, standard-size casket costs $1,499, including ground shipping to major cities in Canada.

Co-founder Paul Frank, the company's, customer service director, said he and his two partners opened shop in 2013 after he buried a relative. "We couldn't believe what the funeral home was trying to charge us for a casket, so we started looking online," he said. After some research, he learned the funeral home was charging four times the price of the same casket he could purchase online.

Burying a loved one is a difficult time for most people, and few ask for a breakdown of prices or have the inclination, in their grief, to start shopping around. The company's caskets are typically made in Asia – mostly China or India – Frank said, because "you can't get the materials from a sustainable source in North America for that cost."

The "made in Asia" label shouldn't cause any alarm, though, he added. "We've had no returns and no issue with quality," he said. (Of course, returns are usually not possible, since once caskets are lowered into the ground, the point of no return has passed.)

Some Jews request that the base of the casket be perforated, in which case holes are drilled into the base. Marc Benjamin said all the caskets at Benjamin's contain six golf ball-sized holes in the base.

Curious about what size casket you'll need? A standard size fits an individual measuring up to seven feet tall and weighing up to 300 tall. People who are taller or heavier require a custom or extra-large casket. ■

Downtown shuls unite after a century apart

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

On a crisp Thursday morning, a chorus of male voices reciting the Shema fills the domed sanctuary of the First Russian Congregation of Rodfei Sholem Anshei Kiev, a.k.a., the Kiever Shul. The service progresses under the watch of two red-eyed lions perched atop the elaborately carved Aron Kodesh.

The Kiever has been a Kensington Market landmark since 1927, but attendance declined significantly when the epicentre of Jewish life shifted from the area to the Bathurst Street corridor in the '50s and '60s.

For decades, the Kiever was only used on Shabbat and holidays. But a year and a half ago, it began co-ordinating mid-week services with Congregation Shaarei Tzedec, known as the Markham Street Shul, and that led to the Kiever's resumption of Thursday-morning services after a 40-year hiatus.

This spirit of co-operation heralds a new era for these two historic shuls. They were originally one congregation, but a family dispute split the group more than 100 years ago.

Dave Pinkus, 91, a lifelong member of the Kiever, heard the story as a youngster. He says Yehuda Leib Bossin, the patriarch of the Bossin family, left the Shaarei Tzedec around 1911 after a bitter dispute with his son, Zussy, an executive member of the shul. They quarrelled over burial rites for Bossin's wife. She ended up interred in the "paupers section" of the Roselawn Cemetery.

A year or so later, Bossin and his younger son, Mottel, became founding members of the Kiever, along with Pinkus' parents, Izzie and Mollie. "What really surprised me was to see the father and the son [Zussy] buried next to each other in the Shaarei Tzedec section of the cemetery on Roselawn Avenue," says Pinkus. "They healed their wounds around 1926."

Ironically, it took much longer for the Kiever and Markham shuls to make amends, say some of their younger affiliates.

"It took 100 years, but we can officially declare that the fight is over," laughs Jeff Phillips, a regular at the Markham Street Shul for more than 30 years.

Menashe Solomon, the second cantor at the Kiever, says nobody knew the details of the rift, but he understood that he was not to go to the Markham Street Shul.

"For 100 years, the members of each congregation refused to set foot in each other's buildings."

Turns out the notion of a century-long feud between the shuls is a Jewish urban myth. Pinkus says the animosity between them dissipated when the Bossins reconciled, but the congregations never reunited.

He surmises that some younger congregants may have wrongly concluded that the shuls' permanent division was rooted in some long-standing acrimony.

> It took 100 years, but we can officially declare that the fight is over.

A weekday Torah service at the Kiever Shul

Pinkus points out that at that time, all the synagogues "operated as separate entities" for practical reasons. "They didn't have much to do with each other, because they didn't want to lose members. They needed the membership for financial support."

Today, however, the interdependence between the older downtown shuls is a pragmatic way to ensure their survival, says Rabbi Yossi Holtzberg, de facto spiritual leader of Shaarei Tzedec.

He laments that getting a weekday minyan has become increasingly challenging, and the problem has worsened with the recent deaths of some older Markham Street Shul members. "The Orthodox community downtown is struggling. There's a lot of competition. You have the Minsker, the [First] Narayever, the Annex Shul, Makom, JUMP [Jewish Urban Meeting Place] and the minyan at the [Miles Nadal] JCC."

The collaboration between the Kiever and the Markham Street shuls has benefited both, says Rabbi Holtzberg. "It's working beautifully. We're sharing the same cake."

He credits Arie Ben-Dor, a young entrepreneur and community organizer, with bringing the congregations together. "He was the guy who pushed it. He saw that the Kiever was empty six days a week."

Ben-Dor acknowledges his role in bolstering attendance at the shuls. He was also key in getting the Kiever to host the Kensington Torah Circle (KTC), a study group that meets Monday evenings. He says KTC draws from the older Orthodox congregations, including the Minsker, along with Makom, the Annex Shul and JUMP.

The merging of the minyans for mid-week services is a serendipitous outcome of what was supposed to be a one-time event, says Ben-Dor. In December 2013, a client of his from Boston who was staying downtown wanted to attend a morning service on Rosh Chodesh and Chanukah. Ben-Dor asked Solomon if the service could be held at the Kiever, and Rabbi Holtzberg helped recruit a minyan.

It went so well that Thursday-morning services at the Kiever continued and the Monday-morning minyan at the Markham Street Shul was strengthened, recalls Ben-Dor. "Yossi [Rabbi Holtzberg] and Menashe [Solomon] are very well respected for their hard work, commitment and drive. And that draws people."

Rabbi Holtzberg, modest by nature, contends the kiddush is a major attraction. "To bring people to a minyan downtown, you have to serve food. People are expecting it."

Indeed, back at the Kiever on this cool Thursday morning, the service is followed by a sumptuous breakfast of herring, gefilte fish, fried eggs, kippers, baked beans, home fries, bagels, cream cheese, lox and pancakes.

A Markham Street Shul regular, who prefers to be known as Chaim ben Ze'ev, has been looking after the kiddush to free up Solomon. "Menashe was running up and down the stairs, back and forth between the sanctuary and kitchen. I told him, 'Give me a key and I'll come in at six in the morning to prepare breakfast.' "

The mood is upbeat as the men fress and shmooze. "A real camaraderie has developed between all of us," says Solomon. "It's a mechayeh."

After benching, a couple of people walk over to Nassau Street to visit Pinkus. The retired engineer has been president of the Kiever for 35 years. He attributes his commitment to his historic family ties and a tendency to be community-minded.

The synagogue was briefly put up for sale in the 1960s, says Pinkus, noting that some members who'd moved away wanted to sell the building. In the end, the membership voted to maintain the downtown congregation. In 1980, support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Ontario government provided seed money for a partial renovation, but Pinkus stresses that the bulk of the work – ongoing for 34 years – has been funded by the congregation.

He has overseen all of the renovations. He says his involvement in other local community groups helped him realize the importance of conserving older buildings.

"Keeping the synagogue going was a way of preserving the historical roots of Toronto's Jewish community for future generations. I felt they could relate better to a structure than a plaque."

The Markham Street Shul has a similar history. The synagogue has been housed in a semi-detached three-storey corner home on Markham and Ulster streets since 1937.

Dr. Joe Greenberg, 92, took over as president of the board when the shul was on the verge of bankruptcy in the mid-1960s.

"We considered selling it," he recounts. "My brother Mutt said, 'I don't go to synagogue often, but when I do go I want it to be this one.' I said, 'OK. If that's what you want, that's the way it's going to be.' He's been our biggest contributor."

Over the years, Greenberg has spearheaded fundraising for renovations and ongoing maintenance. Pinkus calls him "the saviour of the Shaarei Tzedec."

Greenberg stayed downtown like Pinkus, which, at the time, was unusual for a man with a young family. He set up his medical practice and raised four children – who all went to day school – a block from the shul.

Greenberg also has a deep family connection there. His parents, Aaron and Sima, joined the Shaarei Tzedec shortly after their arrival from Russia in 1920. "I have been going there since I was three years old. I could never stand to let the place go. I could not imagine my life without it." ■

Narrow coalition poses challenges for Netanyahu

BEN SALES
JTA, TEL AVIV

Eight weeks after he won re-election, Benjamin Netanyahu finally secured a fourth term as prime minister.

With just 90 minutes until the deadline passed to form a governing coalition on May 6, Netanyahu concluded an agreement with the religious, pro-settler Jewish Home party that gives him the narrowest of parliamentary majorities – 61 of the Knesset's 120 seats.

Along with three other right-wing and religious factions – United Torah Judaism, Kulanu and Shas – the five-party Likud-led coalition skews right on diplomacy and defence and, for the first time in at least a decade, includes no parties that support the establishment of a Palestinian state in the foreseeable future.

The agreement represents something of a setback for Netanyahu, who called for new elections last year in order to strengthen his grip on a legislature he considered to be ungovernable. In the last government, Netanyahu's Likud headed a 68-seat majority coalition. In a statement late last Wednesday announcing the agreement, Netanyahu sought to emphasize the positive.

"Sixty-one is a good number," Netanyahu said upon announcing the agreement. "Sixty-one-plus is a better number, but it begins with 61 and we will begin. There's a lot of work ahead of us. I want us to go to work. It should be very successful for us and for the nation of Israel."

The new coalition is largely in agreement on the question of Palestinian statehood. Having previously voiced support for a Palestinian state, Netanyahu said before the March election that the Palestinians would not get a state on his watch (and then walked back those comments).

Jewish Home is ideologically opposed to any withdrawal from the West Bank and strongly supports settlement growth. Kulanu would limit expansion to major settlement blocs but says statehood is not feasible under the current Palestinian leadership. The haredi Orthodox parties have been agnostic on Palestinian statehood in the past, though recent years have seen the haredi settler population swell.

"We are against giving one centimetre of land to the Arabs, both from moral grounds and security grounds," Naftali Bennett, Jewish Home's leader, said in a Feb. 24 speech. "The biggest mistake is to copy and paste what happened in Gaza in Judea and Samaria," he added, using the biblical names for the West Bank.

Despite agreement on that point, the new coalition is split on other issues, including economic policy and religious affairs, which could pose a challenge as Netanyahu works to keep his 61 lawmakers in line.

"It's a government that will find it hard to instigate much-needed economic reform and even to deal with more mundane affairs of state like passing a budget without being extorted by backbenchers in the coalition," Yohanan Plesner, president of the Israel Democracy Institute think tank, told JTA.

But Hebrew University political science professor Gideon Rahat said the small coalition may make the government more stable, as partners will avoid conflicts that could break up the government.

"In wide coalitions there are ideological differences and people in the coalition think you can disagree and the coalition won't fall," he said. "In a small coalitions they think that if you make small waves, the whole business can collapse."

Likud, with 30 seats, will control the Foreign and Defence Ministries in the next government, along with the corresponding Knesset committees. Economic policy will be run by the 10-seat Kulanu, founded last year by ex-Likudnik Moshe Kahlon, who will serve as finance minister.

Jewish Home, with eight seats, received the education and justice portfolios, while the seven-seat Sephardi haredi Orthodox Shas party will run the Religious Affairs Ministry. The Ashkenazi haredi United Torah Judaism, with six seats, will not appoint any ministers out of an ideological opposition to Zionism, though it will have several deputy ministers.

Netanyahu had a hard time just getting to 61. According to Israeli reports of the secretive coalition talks, Likud's prospective partners sparred with each other on policy and demanded top ministries.

The prime minister succeeded by granting significant concessions to his partners. UTJ demanded a rollback of religious reforms passed by the previous government, Shas received key ministries and Kulanu won the power to enact housing and land reforms.

On May 10, Israel's outgoing cabinet approved a proposal to expand the number of government ministers to more than the current 18.

The decision overturns a law limiting the number of cabinet ministers and deputy ministers.

Netanyahu reportedly plans to appoint 20 ministers and four deputy ministers, and possibly others, in the new government in order to keep all of his coalition partners, and his own party, happy.

The incoming justice minister will be Jewish Home's Ayelet Shaked, 39, who entered Knesset just over two years ago. As minister, Shaked will aim to limit the Israeli Supreme Court's power to overturn laws. Last year, the court invalidated a law allowing long-term detention of African migrants, one of Shaked's key issues.

Days before the May 6 deadline, coalition talks were rocked by the resignation of foreign minister Avigdor Liberman, who announced that his nationalist Yisrael Beiteinu party would sit in the opposition. Yisrael Beiteinu and Likud were allies as recently as last year, but Liberman said the incoming government would be insufficiently hawkish.

Netanyahu may keep the foreign minister title for himself, holding it open should he persuade the centre-left Zionist Union, with 24 seats, to join the coalition. As of May 6, Zionist Union chairman Isaac Herzog said he would lead the Knesset opposition. On Facebook, he called the incoming government "a national failure government."

"We won't be a fifth wheel, and don't intend to save Netanyahu from the holes he's dug himself into," Herzog said at a Zionist Union meeting Thursday. "I won't be Netanyahu's corkscrew. And if he thinks he can dangle this or that [ministerial] portfolio, he's making a big mistake."■

Canadian tries to claim forgotten land

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

An article in The CJN in 1995 spurred a family's campaign to reclaim forgotten land in Israel. Now, after 20 frustrating years of bureaucracy, Meta Surchin, 91, fears she won't hold the deed to her grandfather's land within her lifetime.

"It's not understandable why it should take so long when we have done everything they've asked us to do," says Surchin, who lives in Montreal.

Surchin's grandfather, Abraham Levin, bought two parcels of land, a little under two acres, near Afula in northern Israel, in 1936. A staunch Zionist who attended the early Zionist Congresses in Europe, Levin also knew Chaim Weizmann. "He was there for the wedding of my father and mother," Surchin says. "They were very close friends."

Born in Lithuania, Levin lived most of his life in Montreal, where he founded Dominion Tassel and became one of the wealthiest members of the Jewish community. When the State of Israel appealed to Canadians for investments, he took the lead. "He bought potash mines, orange groves," Surchin says, "and he bought this land."

New Israeli justice minister doesn't shy from controversy

JTA
JERUSALEM

Ayelet Shaked, Israel's newly appointed justice minister and a member of the right-wing Jewish Home party, has quickly risen to prominence having served just two years in the Knesset. Here's what you need to know about the 39-year-old political celebrity.

She's seen as a poster child for Jewish Home's efforts to reach beyond its Orthodox base.

A secular Jew from north Tel Aviv, Shaked is often described as a symbol of the Jewish Home and larger settler movement's effort to appeal to a wider group of voters, and to overcome stereotypes of settlers and their supporters as being religious, gun-toting fanatics. Although she herself travels on Shabbat, she supports Orthodox bans on public transportation during the Sabbath. However, she also played a key role in passing a law (one that now is expected to be reversed as a result of the haredi Orthodox party United Torah Judaism joining Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition) ending military service exemptions for haredi Jews.

Before entering politics, she worked as a software engineer for Texas Instruments.

Shaked served as an instructor in the Israel Defence Forces' Golani Brigade, where she first became interested in right-wing politics. After earning a degree in electrical engineering and computer science at Tel Aviv University, she began working for Texas Instruments. Before running for Knesset with Jewish Home, she worked as Netanyahu's office director for two years, leaving together with Naftali Bennett, in 2008, reportedly because of conflicts with Netanyahu's wife, Sara.

Her Knesset record includes efforts to curb the High Court of Justice's power.

As a Knesset member, Shaked has pushed for passage of an amendment that would limit the High Court of Justice's power, and has been an advocate for deporting African migrants, defending the government policy of detaining them in a Negev facility. She also supported the controversial "Jewish state" law, which would enshrine Israel's status as a Jewish state into law. (Critics of the law said it undermined Israel's democracy.)

She's a fierce critic of Israel's left and its media.

In an op-ed she published in Ha'aretz (responding to one about her headlined "A Knesset member whose irresponsible violence belies her appearance") she described Israel's political left as "delusional" and having "lost every vestige of self-control."

She posted a controversial article on Facebook last summer, drawing a flurry of attention and criticism.

The day the bodies of three kidnapped Israeli teens were found (and the day before Jewish Israelis murdered Palestinian teen Muhammad Abu Khdeir in a revenge attack), Shaked posted an article by Uri Elitzur that called Palestinian children "little snakes" and argued that it was justified to bomb civilians when they give shelter to "evil."

She was named the best-looking female in the Knesset.

In a recent poll conducted by the Israeli Society of Plastic and Aesthetic Surgery, Shaked beat out former fashion model Orly Levy-Abekasis of Yisrael Beitenu, another right-wing party. ■

GUEST VOICE

For Ethiopians ,life in Israel is frustrating and dangerous

Judie Oron

A few years ago, while waiting by the elevator in our Tel Aviv apartment building, an Israeli neighbour nodded sagely at my Ethiopian Jewish daughter. "I'm so glad Judie finally got someone in to clean for her," she said, nodding approvingly. Wuditu bobbed her head and shot me a quick grin.

"What country in Africa do you come from, dear," the neighbour kindly inquired. A flicker of pain was quickly replaced by a pensive expression in Wuditu's eyes. Knowing her penchant for irony, I thought, "Oh boy, this is going to be good.

"Africa?" my daughter inquired, the very picture of innocent confusion. "Why, I can't imagine why you'd think I'm from Africa. I'm from Russia," she replied. That comment did the trick - our ride up to the ninth floor was from then on blessedly quiet.

But the questions never seem to end when a white mother strolls about with her two Ethiopian Jewish daughters. My favorite one of Wuditu's retorts came after a lady on a bus walked over to us and asked, in Hebrew, "aich mekablim ka'eyleh?" Or, in English, "how do you get [girls] like them?" While I was trying to figure out how to answer the woman, Wuditu fired back: "Hurry, madam, because just for today, at the supermarket down the road, you can buy two of us for the price of one!"

In Wuditu's case, the word "buy" was not inappropriate, because 23 years ago that's just what I did: I bought Wuditu during a slave trade in a market town in northern Ethiopia. The transaction was cheap – $111.11. The child, when I found her, was emaciated and humbled to the point where she would bow down low whenever anyone looked at her. Clearly, this behaviour had been expected of a young captive.

So, imagine my pride as I watch Wuditu handling comments that range from the stupid to the downright malicious with a huge dollop of chutzpah and the poise of a standup comedian. In fact, I often can't help kvelling as I watch the girls navigate their relations with Israelis with quiet, rapier-sharp humour. Still, these and less innocuous comments hurt them and it hurts me to watch it happening.

For most Ethiopian Jews, life in Israel is galling, frustrating and even, as we saw last week, dangerous. Over the years, Israeli media have covered several reports by Ethiopian youths who've been attacked and arrested by police officers for reasons as ridiculous as sitting on a park bench late at night. Also extensively covered are reports of Ethiopian Israelis routinely refused entry to nightclubs and of children prevented from registering for a local kindergarten or school. Not so long ago, a building's residents even banded together to prevent the dreaded Ethiopians from buying or renting in their building

It would be too much to expect all Ethiopian Israelis to have developed the kind of sang froid that Wuditu has so painstakingly acquired in response to unrelenting racist interactions. But, does justified anger warrant the kind of violent protest we saw in the last few days? Clearly not, and it's a sad statement on their relations that the next generation of Ethiopians have come to believe that substantive change can only come after you raise your voice and, it seems, your fist.

Judie Oron is a Canadian/Israeli journalist and the author of Cry of the Giraffe: Based on a True Story – the award-winning account of her daughter Wuditu's experience as a slave in war-torn Ethiopia.

Canadian trying to claim Israeli land bought 80 years ago

Eight years later, when Levin and his wife died, there was no record of the land, and the property was completely forgotten.

Then, in 1995, Surchin's son Mark came across an article in The CJN titled "Many Diaspora Jews own unclaimed Israeli land." The article began, "Do you unknowingly own land in Israel? Before you reply in the negative, read on."

The article ended with a list of Canadian investors, including, to Mark's surprise, Abraham Levin. He notified his mother, and the family began the process of claiming the land.

Initially, things seemed simple. The family's lawyer told them, "You have to convince the authorities that your mother really is the heir of Abraham Levin." This seemed like a standard legal process.

However, as the situation evolved, over multiple trips to have documents certified at the Israeli Consulate, the picture became more complex. Part of the bureaucracy stems from Israel's "apotropos" system of guardianship, a term dating back to the Ottoman period, whereby the land is administered for absentee owners.

A local moshav has also been using part of the land since before Levin bought it. "It's unclear… what their rights are," Mark says. Surchin will probably need to buy them out before she can take possession.

"We've had a chicken and egg situation," Mark says. "Do we spend the money to put the land in her name and then see what happens, or look for someone to buy the land first?"

This year at last, the family finally found a buyer for the land. However, this seemingly simple real estate deal now hangs in a fragile balance. While the apotropos has finally recognized Meta Surchin's claim, the family is waiting for the Israeli land registry to put the deed in her name before the sale.

Haifa-based real estate lawyer Dena Slonim, who has dealt with many similar cases, although not directly with Surchin's, says the process of registering a claim on "ownerless" land under apotropos control can be "lengthy and complicated.

"There have been cases of unscrupulous persons taking advantage of the absence of the owner and fraudulently taking control of properties," Slonim told The CJN. The Israeli bureaucracy "does [its] best to prevent this, sometimes raising insurmountable barriers for legitimate heirs."

Meta Surchin, 91

Mark, who lives in Toronto, isn't sure how much the land will ultimately be worth. "Initially, we had no clue if it was worth anything… We just thought that if Abraham Levin bought it, we should honour his memory by putting it in my mother's name; that's what he would want."

"It's less than the average price of a house in Toronto," he says, perhaps somewhere just under a million dollars. The family will probably see much less. "There's the development levy… betterment tax, capital gains tax, legal fees. When all is said and done, I expect it'll be under $500,000."

Slonim said these charges can lead to further delays, particularly when families are unable or unwilling to pay. "Each case is unique, fascinating, and often tragic, as the history of the family, and of the Jewish People in the 20th century, comes to light," she says.

Zionism has always run deep in the Surchin family. Surchin's father, Leon Levin, was just as active in Israeli causes as his father had been. Her daughter, Eleanor Schneider, made aliyah in 1973 and is currently a lecturer at the University of Haifa. Levin now has descendants living all over Israel.

Given the family's unwavering loyalty to Israel, they've been stunned by the obstacles. "It has felt to us," says Mark, "like there's some kind of a conspiracy here."

Slonim believes that the delays have probably not stemmed from any official government stance. "The… Israeli government position on foreign ownership of land is more of an economic issue: I don't think that the difficulties imposed on foreign citizens trying to claim ownership… are related."

Regardless of the cause, Surchin herself is disappointed that Israeli officials have seemingly done all they can to stall the family's claim. "My grandfather would be very upset," she says. "It needs to be resolved." ■

Jewish Life

Life in Israel is not always a cabaret

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

In 2010, Nir Paldi set out to create and star in a one-man show about his conflicted Israeli and Jewish identity, but after showing the piece he'd been working on to friends and colleagues, he felt it didn't adequately capture the depth of his feelings.

"The format of me standing there storytelling was so direct, there wasn't enough distance," Paldi said. "So I thought about having some sort of mask or coverup."

What emerged was Ballad of the Burning Star, a cabaret-style drag show that explores elements of the Israeli experience and addresses themes of victimhood, persecution, love and violence.

Paldi plays Star, an Israeli drag queen armed with a troupe of five divas, or "starlets," acted by an all-female international cast who also play the show's alternate characters.

Produced by Paldi and his co-artistic director and life partner George Mann's London-based theatre company Theatre Ad Infinitum, Ballad has toured in the United Kingdom and will have its North American debut at Toronto's The Theatre Centre May 19.

"I'm not the first person to discover that cabaret is an excellent vehicle for speaking about political themes," said Paldi.

The 32-year-old Israeli was raised in a Jewish settlement near Jerusalem, but at age 23, a few months after completing his military service, he moved to Paris to study theatre.

Framed by the device of cabaret, the narrative unfolds through the different characters put on by Star and touches on what Paldi referred to as "basic Israeli concepts."

The main story within the story is about a boy named Yisrael who lives on an Israeli settlement with his brother Eitan.

Various formative episodes in Yisrael's life, as well as both familial and historical incidences – including his brother being killed in a terrorist attack, aggression he faces at the hands of his Palestinian neighbours, his grandmother's Holocaust experiences, Israel's collective trauma during the Gulf War and Yisrael's sense of guilt and shame at having killed a Palestinian child during his military service – are told through what Paldi called "culturally specific melodies and dance routines."

In unpacking some of his early experiences to serve as fodder for the story, Paldi said he'd started to realize the effect the tense political climate in Israel had on him growing up, and began reflecting more on why he decided to leave the country.

"I remember being shocked at the strength of emotion it aroused in me when I started speaking about things in the collective consciousness of Israel rather than the personal, and found myself breaking into tears speaking about this to George, who's not Israeli and not Jewish," Paldi recalled.

All audiences can relate to Ballad, Paldi stressed, though how informed one is about the political situation in Israel will affect one's experience of the play.

"We always want to make sure the context is clear and that the piece is informative as well as entertaining and tragic," he said, adding that those with strong opinions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict tend to find the play provocative.

"Often, I'd finish performing and would be approached by a pro-Israeli person and a pro-Palestinian person at the same time and they'd both say, 'Don't you think this piece is one-sided?' And I'd walk away and leave them to discuss the piece with each other," Paldi chuckled.

This is what makes Ballad so strong, he emphasized, that it doesn't seek to give an answer to the conflict.

"I wanted to show how helpless one sometimes feels when faced with how complex and painful the reality there is." ■

Ballad runs May 19 to 24 at The Theatre Centre, co-presented by Acting Up Stage Company and Why Not Theatre in association with Koffler Centre of the Arts. Tickets can be purchased at www.theatrecentre.org

Yiddish singer grew up without connection to Judaism

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Singer Lenka Lichtenberg used to be known almost exclusively for her original Yiddish compositions and her delightful arrangements of traditional Yiddish music, but in recent years she has emerged as a world-music artist and a singer of cantorial liturgy.

A child star of music theatre in her native Prague, she was once a folksinger in Denmark and later became a lounge singer in Vancouver.

"I hadn't really found myself," she said.

It was on Masada, during a visit to Israel, that she resolved to become a Yiddish singer. "I needed to make my life more meaningful," she explained, adding that since Yiddish is a dying language, she wanted to do her part to keep it alive.

Lichtenberg grew up without a connection to Judaism or Jewish culture. In fact, until she was eight years old, she had no idea that she was Jewish. She was on her way to perform at a Jewish community centre in Prague, when her mother, a teenage survivor of Theresiendstadt, told her about her true identity. Both of Lichtenberg's parents were raised in assimilated families, and her mother, Renee, a philosophy professor, was baptized Roman Catholic.

To become a Yiddish singer, Lichtenberg listened to the music on record and took Yiddish language lessons. But she had the nagging feeling that she was an outsider, a "pretender," because of her background.

"Most Yiddish singers have parents who speak Yiddish," she said. To help overcome her unease, she focused on pronouncing the Yiddish words she sang correctly.

"It's not authentic to me, not having grown up in it, but I had to make it as authentic to me I could," she said.

Lichtenberg went on to record three solo Yiddish albums. A member of the popular Sisters of Sheynville, she provided the arrangements of Yiddish swing and klezmer for the group's award-winning CD, Sheynville Express.

But Lichtenberg found herself becoming creatively restless and wanted to explore other musical avenues, so she began experimenting with Middle Eastern rhythms in her songs. On her spellbinding 2010 recording, Fray (also the name of her band), you can hear the rhythms of the Middle East, as well Indian and Brazilian styles. Fray includes Yiddish poetry, which was set to music by Lichtenberg.

"The melodies and words are always in some way or other coming from the Jewish treasury," she said. She followed up Fray with another world-fusion release in 2013, Embrace, for which she won a Canadian Folk Music Award.

Lenka Lichtenberg

Lichtenberg also immersed herself in cantorial study and now co-leads Shabbat and High Holiday services at the Reconstructionist synagogue, Congregation Darchei Noam.

"I found a congregation where I'm at home," she said, adding that they've allowed her to learn on the job. "At first, I couldn't read Hebrew, but they let me participate. Every year I know a little more of liturgy and I set goals for myself."

Her sublime 2012 release, the award-winning Songs for the Breathing Walls, is made up of Jewish liturgical poems and prayers set to music written by Lichtenberg and other composers. Recorded in 12 synagogues in the Czech Republic, the 17 tracks are blended with Arabic, Jewish and Celtic arrangements.

"Each synagogue had its own history. Somehow I felt I was connecting with the long-gone community," she said. She is planning to record the second volume of Songs for the Breathing Walls next year in different synagogues in the Czech Republic.

Lichtenberg, who has a master's degree in ethnomusicology, took another musical detour recently, which led to the release of Lullabies from Exile last year at Ashkenaz. Lullabies, which has been nominated for an Independent Music Award, includes Yiddish and Iraqi Jewish music, as well as traditional Czech lullabies.

She's holding a European launch of Lullabies on June 28 in the Jerusalem Synagogue in Prague, one of the few synagogues that's still used as a place of worship in the Czech Republic.

This fall, Lichtenberg and her band Fray will play a few Ontario dates before they tour the United States. An EP of remixes she's working on is set to be released this September.

Klezmer Conservatory Band still popular 35 years later

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When the Klezmer Conservatory Band put on its first concert in 1980, musician Hankus Netsky says he thought it would also be their last live performance.

The band consisted only of him and 15 others, mainly students from the New England Conservatory of Music and musicians from the local Jewish community in Boston. After a rapturous reaction from that premiere concert, Netsky says he got offers for three more performances – all paying gigs.

"Many people were affected by [the music] so viscerally that they knew this was something that could really have a wide audience," he told The CJN on the phone from Boston.

Thirty-five years after Netsky started it, the Klezmer Conservatory Band (KCB) is still going strong. It will return to Toronto on May 13 for a concert of klezmer and Yiddish music at Holy Blossom Temple.

When Netsky started the group, klezmer music was mostly defunct in the United States. Netsky credits its recent resurgence in North America and Europe to the interest among Jews in reconnecting to their ancestry.

As a teenager, Netsky said he felt as if he was missing an integral part of his heritage, as he was not learning much about where the Jews came from.

"The very languages, the Yiddish and the Ashkenazi Hebrew… they were buried at that time," he said. "The accents of my grandfather, my father even, were not what I was learning in Hebrew school."

He also knew that his grandfather and uncle had played in klezmer orchestras back in the 1920s, so the traditional music intrigued him.

Netsky said that watching Irish musicians jam together to revive their own culture influenced him to embrace his ethnic roots in music.

"Any of us who were attuned to culture or the arts, we tended to want to work for something that might resonate with where we came from and who we were," he said.

Although members have come and gone, nearly all of today's nine-piece band have played with the KCB for 25 years. Bassist Jim Guttmann and frequent vocalist Judy Bresler have been with the band from the beginning.

The group still works constantly. Last summer, members of the band worked on a film score for a documentary, Theodore Bikel: In the Shoes of Sholom Aleichem.

In April, they unveiled an updated version of In the Fiddler's House, with Itzhak Perlman and Andy Statman, at Carnegie Hall in New York. Netsky said he hopes the band will bring that concert to Canada.

Netsky also has a new book coming out in June: Klezmer: Music and Community in Twentieth-Century Jewish Philadelphia. Meanwhile, Netsky has a personal connection to Holy Blossom cantor Benjamin Maissner. As a young man, Netsky said he has fond memories of Maissner, who worked in his hometown of Philadelphia. Maissner was a hip cantor in the city's Jewish community, doing services infused with rock and jazz music that were popular with young adults.

"I did not belong to his synagogue," Netsky said. "But if you wanted to hang around with interesting kids who were fun to be with, you went there."

Like Netsky, Maissner had ancestors connected to a Jewish music scene. His great-uncle, Israel Alter, was a chief cantor in Hanover, Germany, before World War II.

Without an Ashkenaz Festival this year, Maissner said he wanted to bring the group back to Toronto. The KCB has performed at Roy Thomson Hall in recent years for Chai Life fundraisers.

"The music that they play is very nostalgic, reminiscent of Jewish and eastern European culture," Maissner said, adding that their performances are more traditional and less jazz-infused than those of many current bands that play Yiddish music. "It's a very unique sound." ■

Winnipeg film fest channels Sophie Tucker

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

The 2015 Winnipeg International Jewish Film Festival showcases a menu of outstanding films on themes incorporating the Holocaust and modern Israel, with a side dish of the legendary Jewish performer Sophie Tucker.

The 12th edition of the festival runs May 26 to June 6, presented by Asper Foundation Performances and the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

"We are excited to have the producers of The Outrageous Sophie Tucker with us for a question and answer session after the screening," said Tamar Barr, the Rady Centre's assistant executive director. "We don't often have the producers/directors of the films attend the festival."

The producers, Susan and Lloyd Ecklер, based their documentary on several hundred recently discovered personal scrapbooks in tracing the 60-year career of the legendary Jewish star of vaudeville, Broadway, radio, television and the movies. The Ecklers spent seven years researching their documentary.

Another coup for this year's festival was being able to secure the Academy Award-winning Ida (2015, Best Foreign Language film of the year). The joint Polish, French, Danish production is about a young novitiate nun in 1960s Poland, who is on the verge of taking her vows when she learns of her Jewish parentage and goes off with a surviving aunt – a Communist party functionary – to try to find out what happened to the younger woman's parents.

Ida will be presented at Winnipeg festival.

From South America come two films with Nazi connections. The Academy Award-nominated The German Doctor is also set in the early 1960s. A joint Argentinian-French-Norwegian-Spanish production, the drama connects the notorious Nazi doctor Josef Mengele, an Argentine family who entrusts their young daughter to his care and an Israeli secret agent in pursuit of the evil doctor.

Comedy is also featured. Mr. Kaplan is a story about an elderly Jewish man living in Uruguay who comes to suspect that a quiet older German man is a wanted Nazi and plots to kidnap him and smuggle him out of Uruguay to Israel.

Heye Shalom, Peter Schwarz is a joint Israeli-German production about a sister and brother – Holocaust survivors – who were separated at war's end with the sister, Michla, going to Israel and the brother, Feiv'ke, presumed dead. But he ends up living in East Germany in the shadow of the concentration camp where he was a prisoner – married to a German woman. The film presents the Holocaust as seen through the third generation, uncovers family secrets and shows that it is never too late to rediscover one's heritage.

A second American entry in the festival is Above and Beyond, the Untold True Story about Jewish American pilots who fought for Israel in 1948. The film examines the motivation of the volunteer pilots (both Jewish and non-Jewish) and their role in the young Jewish state's survival.

Most of the other films are Israeli-made. The Gett,the Trial of Vivian Amsalem is an eye-opening view of the difficulty that Israeli women have in getting a Jewish divorce, a get, from their estranged husbands.

Magic Men, also from Israel, is a father and son road trip in Greece that takes the father back to his youth in Nazi-occupied Greece, where he was hidden by a local magician.

Bethlehem, Israel's Academy Award entry in the Best Foreign Language category last year, is an examination of the complex relationship of an Israeli intelligence officer and his Palestinian informant.

Zero Motivation is a humorous look at daily life for a group of young, female soldiers in a remote Israeli desert outpost.

Then there is the French documentary 24 Days, the harrowing account of young French Jew Ilan Halimi, who was kidnapped, tortured and murdered by an Arab gang early in 2006, and the unsuccessful search for him. The doc focuses on what his parents went through during the time he was missing and how the authorities bungled the case.

Barr notes that many of the films usually sell out well in advance. ■

Dancing Arabs explores life as a minority in Israel

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As Israeli director Eran Riklis's new drama, Dancing Arabs, has screened around the world, distributors have danced with trying to get the title right.

Dancing Arabs, opening in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal on May 15, is the original title, from one of the two Sayed Kashua novels that inspired the film. In France, the title translates to My Son, My Heart Dances is its name in Germany. The United States has the film listed as A Borrowed Identity.

"I think [Dancing Arabs] is a great title," Riklis tells The CJN on the day of the film's premiere at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, where it was the opening night pick. "I think distributors are afraid of the word 'Arabs.' They fear it will categorize the film as being political."

Although his drama does contain political content, Riklis says he hopes audiences are open to hearing a story from one of the 1.6 million Arabs that live in Israel. Arabs comprise 20 per cent of Israel's population, but Riklis says a lot of Israelis ignore their presence.

Danielle Kitzis and Tawfeek Barhom as Naomi and Eyad in Dancing Arabs.

The "dancing" of the title is not literal, but a reference to how Arabs must learn to move and orient themselves as a minority population.

Dancing Arabs tells the story of Eyad, played by newcomer Tawfeek Barhom. Eyad is a brainy kid who gets accepted into a top Israeli high school, only to realize he is the only Arab in his class. Although Eyad tries to fit in, he soon falls madly in love with a Jewish girl, which complicates his life.

The story of this cultural difference was not just inherent to Kashua, an Israeli-Arab journalist who wrote the source materials and the screenplay. Riklis says that Barhom also identified with Eyad's journey.

"He also went to boarding school... he had an affair with a Jewish girl," Riklis says of his leading man. "I also needed an authentic Arab kid, but someone that you wouldn't [automatically] associate as Arab. You feel [Barhom] could be anybody, and in that sense, he was perfect."

Barhom actually lived in the village of Ein Rafa as a child – the same place where Riklis shot his 2004 film The Syrian Bride. As a pre-teen, Barhom would visit the set. Upon meeting Riklis for Dancing Arabs, Barhom told him that watching the filming of that production made him fall in love with cinema.

Dancing Arabs was supposed to have a splashy premiere at last summer's Jerusalem Film Festival, says Riklis, who is one of Israel's top directors after films like Lemon Tree and Zaytoun.

However, the conflict in Gaza muted the opening. The festival debut was scaled back and the film's planned summer release date was delayed until November.

One central theme of Dancing Arabs is the shortsightedness of education. In the film, the teachers in both classrooms – the Arab primary school he attends as a boy and the prestigious Israeli high school explore a selective history of Israel.

These two different perspectives suggest reluctance on educators' parts to explain the other side of the story. Riklis says there are a lot of mistakes being done in both classrooms.

"Education is the basis for change for younger people," he says. "If you don't get the education right, no good can happen later on."

Riklis is currently working on more films that take place in or are connected to Israel. He says that an upcoming project deals with the aftermath of the Six-Day War.

Although the director says he would not object to telling stories derived from other places, he wants to keep his focus on social and political life in Israel.

"It's a little bit of a duty to expose these kinds of stories, because otherwise, they go unnoticed." ■

Zoe follows in the path of her singer/songwriter parents

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Zoe Sky Jordan's songs have been featured on the TV series Less Than Kind and Lost Girl, on the soundtrack of a CBC retrospective on 60 years of hockey and in Starbucks cafes around the world.

One of the first songs she wrote, at 17, was placed in the TV series Degrassi: The Next Generation. That song, Tonight, was the first she ever played for her parents, Amy Sky and Marc Jordan, who are both renowned Toronto singer-songwriters. Sky Jordan, 24, said she'd written songs before penning Tonight, but she'd been hesitant to play them for her parents because she felt the songs were inferior.

"My parents weren't going to encourage bad songwriting," she said, speaking on the phone from Nashville, where she's recording her new album.

When Sky Jordan, whose musical education included analyzing songs on radio with her parents, played Tonight for her parents, she was confident they would like it.

"My dad said it was good," she recalled, adding that her mom fixed the bridge and, as a co-writer, took 20 per cent of the writer's royalty.

After Tonight was placed on Degrassi, Sky Jordan's music became a staple of the show's soundtrack. Since then, her songs have also been released online. Her 2012 six-song EP, Restless, Unfocused, what she calls her "first, solid, solo release," was picked up by Starbucks and played worldwide in their stores.

Footsteps, a song she wrote with Colleen Dauncey, her partner in the synth-pop band Petty Victories, was featured on the soundtrack of a CBC retrospective on 60 years of Hockey Night in Canada during the opening game of the 2013 season.

Earlier this year, Sky Jordan lived and worked in Los Angeles, where she co-wrote the song In Another Life with electronic-music artist Kyler England. It'll be part of the soundtrack of the TV show Switched at Birth.

Sky Jordan writes dreamy melodies with lyrics that paint a picture. Like her father, Marc, Sky Jordan, is dyslexic and so the songs she writes are sometimes inspired by visual images, including movies.

"I love old movies, and maybe because I'm dyslexic, I like visual stuff. That triggers my mind. I get more visual metaphors than anything else," she said, adding that she likes to "write about a small moment and make it a really big deal."

Her voice can be either sultry or haunting, depending on the mood of the song she's singing, but she's also comfortable performing emotionally charged songs in higher ranges.

Sky Jordan, who performed with her parents while she was growing up, says singing came to her naturally. The first time she was on stage with them she was three years old. "I just kind of wandered on stage where my parents were playing. My family always encouraged that kind of stuff," she said.

In early April, Sky Jordan arrived in Nashville, after driving from Los Angeles, to record her first full-length release. She came with her demos and picked out some of the songs for the new recording in her first week in the songwriting capital of the world. She expects to launch the yet untitled recording in Toronto this summer.

A collector of vintage clothing, jewelry and bric-a-brac, she plans to sell vintage merchandise at her launch. "It's sort of like having an Etsy store at the show," she said.

While she's in Toronto, she'll also be performing at venues around the city, including at the Cameron on Queen Street West, with her boyfriend, singer-songwriter Liam Titcomb, who is doing a residency there this summer. She is also featured on Thomas Fiss' newly released single, Orbit. ■

For more information about her, visit zoeskyjordan.flavors.me or contact her through Facebook.

The war in all its facets

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Once it was said to be the poor who were always with us, but nowadays it seems it is the war that we cannot be without. Anniversaries abound – VE-Day, the liberation of Dachau and of Auschwitz. The obituary pages are full of the longest-living among survivors of wartime events.

Most recently, 95-year-old Jozef Paczinski died; a Polish inmate of Auschwitz, his responsibility through much of his time in the camp was to cut the hair of camp commandant Rudolf Höss.

Movies and books about World War II appear apace, in what must be seen as a new wave of creative grappling with the subject. Canonical writers – Primo Levi, Elie Wiesel, Tadeusz Borowski and Anne Frank – lurk in the wings demanding rereading.

In Germany, Look Who's Back, the first novel by satirist Timur Vermes, has sold over 1.5 million copies. Its would-be comic feature is the resurrection of Hitler in a field in Berlin. What follows is hijinks – this is the only word for Vermes' use of a Hitlerian monologue to critique cooking shows, the Internet and present-day German politics.

If Look Who's Back offers an example of the new lowbrow view of wartime themes, Anthony Doerr's Pulitzer Prize-winning All the Light We Cannot See is a recent contribution to a serious tradition of novelistic investigations of the war. Its back cover copy informs us that the novel was "10 years in the writing," an argument, one might guess, for the fact that Doerr has done his research. But unlike other novelizations of historical events, Doerr does not include a list of "additional reading" to allow readers to follow his research.

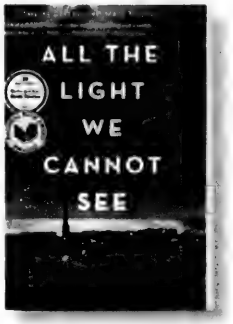
All the Light We Cannot See opens by entering the historical fray in the summer of 1944. It is the beginning of the Allied bombing campaign over Brittany's walled citadel of Saint-Malo, and the Germans are holed up as part of the last gasp of their occupation of western Europe.

The novel is pieced together like an ingeniously edited film, stepping forward and backward in time, though the bulk of its action takes place between 1940 and 1944. Its short chapters shift between a portrait of a blind Parisian girl's arrival at Saint-Malo, and that of Werner Pfennig, a German child prodigy who ends up at an elite school where boys are taught the scientific, racial and violent creed of the new Germany.

A thoughtful review of Vermes' Look Who's Back relied on an influential piece of literary criticism penned in the 1920s by E.M. Forster: "The historian deals with actions, and with the characters of men only so far as he can deduce them from their actions." The novelist, on the other hand, must "reveal the hidden life at its source: to tell us more about Queen Victoria than could be known…"

It is telling – each reader will have their own sense of this – that our reception of blind Marie-Laure, her fierce love for her father, her preternatural way of learning the layout of neighbourhoods, her experience of the destruction of Saint-Malo – does not make us wonder about Doerr's ability to get things right historically. Like Roberto Benigni in the Jim Jarmusch film Down by Law, Marie-Laure is proof that we live in a sad and beautiful world.

But when it comes to Werner and his proto-Nazi school chums, the brutal male teachers and mincing female support staff of the Reich's heyday, I hesitate. Here, Doerr must rise to Forster's challenge "to tell us more about" the German Nazi outlook "than could be known." The challenge is worthwhile, but it's difficult to know if we're being served anything like the real thing.



All the Light We Cannot See,
Anthony Doerr
Scribner

Unlike Vermes – who pitches a darkly humorous mass murderer – Doerr presents a likable and idiosyncratic young German at the centre of his tale. Werner Pfennig is no hero – his shame at not standing up for his weaker compatriots is clearly drawn. But the swiftness with which he is drawn into the elite institutions of Nazi culture irritates even his devoted sister. "You'll become," she tells him, thinking of the sycophantic boys in their circle, "just like Hans and Herribert."

The initiation and instruction methods at Werner's boarding school are brutal. The weak fall away. Science is taught with an eye on the country's need for jet propulsion rockets. Teachers view the strong and smart as cogs in the national machinery demanded in "exceptional times."

One of the strengths in Doerr's approach is his willingness to write contrary to most Holocaust-related fiction, which offers detailed depictions of victims but little examination of actual Germans. Because of the hierarchy of guards, kapos and ghetto police in German camps and ghettos, the average inmate had little interaction with the German SS. Even privileged prisoners, like the non-Jewish Pole Tadeusz Borowski, encountered SS at Auschwitz as stoic, distant overseers of a host of prisoners forced into the system of killing Jews and political prisoners.

Doerr's portraits of wartime German types are of interest. The lead teacher at Werner's school is a voluptuous sadist, reminiscent, at least physically, of Hermann Goering. A technical sciences teacher called Hauptmann operates in relation to Werner as Dr. Frankenstein did to his monster, opting to turn his favoured student into a disciplined servant of the science of war.

When Werner and a friend travel to Berlin for a school holiday, the friend's mother affects an aristocratic Nazi politesse. In her apartment full of "sleek and shiny" modern accoutrements, she is quick to report that the building's last Jewish tenant, Frau Schwartzenberger, "will be gone by year's end."

Here one encounters one of the oddities of Doerr's portrayal of the "hidden life" of wartime Germany: we are halfway into a rather long novel before the first notable encounter with an actual Jew. Frau Schwartzenberger makes her appearance as a companion in an elevator ride. Afterward Werner marvels to himself, "A Jewess," choosing a word that is prime bait for readers prone to wonder if this is how Germans spoke to themselves in 1941. (Is the anachronistic word "Jewess" meant as some approximation of a prissy German word, or is it simply an awkward choice, a infelicitous term as dead in the linguistic water as poetess?)

These are good readerly challenges. Doerr takes on Forster's proposition and works with fierce and poetic detail to render the Bretons of Saint-Malo and the Germans of the ascendant Reich, even if there are points at which the narrative demands "additional reading." ■

Making Phoenix was necessary for German director

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

German director Christian Petzold and actor Nina Hoss were still recovering from jetlag when they arrived at the Elgin Theatre in Toronto. They had flown in from Germany for the second night of the Toronto International Film Festival last fall. Even though they were dazed from the time shift, they were alert. It was the night of the world premiere of their latest collaboration, the postwar drama Phoenix.

Many of the thousand or so ticket buyers sat, hushed and mesmerized by the film, which opened theatrically in select Canadian cities on May 8. However, during the film's climactic scene, Petzold and Hoss were taken aback by how many in the audience had started laughing.

"I was like, Oh my God. What's happening?" Hoss tells The CJN the afternoon after Phoenix's premiere. "I really had to think about [the laughter]. Did we do something wrong?"

The actor's doubts soon vanished when the crowd gave the film a rapturous applause as the end credits rolled. The disorienting reaction to that big reveal, which I would hate to spoil, was appropriate for a film about lies and deception.

Phoenix tells the story of Nelly (played by Hoss), a survivor of Auschwitz. The war is over, but Nelly's face is badly disfigured.

Phoenix, starring Ronald Zehrfeld and Nina Hoss, received amazing reviews at TIFF.

After surgery gives her a new look, Nelly sets out to find her husband, Johnny (Ronald Zehrfeld). Nelly believes that he may have had sold her out to the Nazis. Underneath her new guise, she tries to find out the truth.

To prepare for this character that has just gone through intense trauma, Hoss says she chose not to speak with Holocaust survivors or read testimonies. She was worried that she didn't want to go through such sensitive material.

Instead, she watched documentaries, including Claude Lanzmann's Shoah, to immerse herself in the despair and darkness of war. One moment in that film, a barber talks with a bit too much volume and glee about how he cut people's hair before they stepped into the gas chambers. Then, as he is working, his wife walks by.

"His voice is gone," Hoss says of this unnerving moment. "[As an actor], I can take so much from looking at someone's eyes, when you see this horror coming back and you're not able to go over it with a loud voice."

Reading books and watching documentaries was the key to getting her into the mindset of a woman trying to figure out a new, foreign world around her. Hoss says she did not read the novel Phoenix – loosely based on Hubert Monteilhet's Return from the Ashes – until after the film finished production.

Petzold originally read that book in German after learning about it in the magazine Film Critic, which mentioned it in an article about the Alfred Hitchcock film Vertigo. At the time, he says he thought it would be impossible to make a film that combined Auschwitz and Hitchcock.

Just a few years ago, though, Petzold was reminded of this novel when he attended a screening at the Berlin International Film Festival, of documentary footage Hitchcock shot from Auschwitz. That film was infamously never released, as the director was so devastated by the material. (A new restored print with that footage is slowly finding an audience at film centres around the world.)

Petzold said that making such a film was necessary for him to deal with the "big historical cut" before and after the war. Due to the rise of Nazism, much of German culture, including art, music, film and fashion was lost, resulting in a hole between the generations.

"You make a period picture to research around this cut," he says. "For someone in the cinema business in Germany, they ask, 'Where are the comedies? Why don't we have musicals or genres like film noir?' It's because we destroyed it."

Alas, the desire to laugh as relief from a tense postwar story probably helps to close that gap too. ■

Jewish book awards to go on despite Koffler hiatus

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As they watch the usual awards get handed out, book lovers who attend the upcoming Canadian Jewish Literary Awards ceremony next October will likely have reason to ponder the familiar question, "Why is this night different from all other nights?"

In a plot twist reminiscent of Mutiny On The Bounty, a group of jury members is preparing to stage the awards at York University next October even though the hosting organization, the Koffler Centre for the Arts, recently announced that the 27-year-old awards would be taking a hiatus in 2015 while Koffler rethinks their future.

"We're putting on the awards because we want to fill a void," said Ed Trapunski, one of six jurors who say it would be unfair to authors and publishers if the awards were to miss a year.

Koffler declared the hiatus last December after the jury seemed unwilling to accept some proposed new guidelines and changes for the awards, which included set terms for jury members and a reduction in the number of categories from the present nine (and more in some years) to only four.

"They wanted to eliminate the Yiddish, Holocaust and Scholarship categories," Trapunski said. "Those of us on the jury felt very strongly that these are very strong aspects of Jewish books, and we wanted to maintain these categories."

The matter arose after a 10-year sponsorship arrangement for the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards ended in June 2014. Unwilling to run the awards at a deficit, the Koffler had proposed fewer awards and higher cash prizes that would raise the media profile of the awards. The Koffler contends that the proposed changes – more in keeping with the idealized model of Canada's famous Giller Prize – would make it easier to find new sponsors.

With the assistance of juror Sara Horowitz, acting director of the Jewish studies program at York University, financial and logistical support for the Canadian Jewish Literary Awards is to be supplied this year and perhaps into the future by the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University and other Jewish studies programs at Concordia, McGill and the universities of Toronto, Ottawa and Western Ontario.

Meanwhile, the Koffler Centre has indicated it will release its plans for the awards in early May. "We decided to put the awards on hiatus to figure them out," said Koffler executive director Cathy Jonasson. "We fully intend to continue with them. We want people to pay attention to them."

Founded by then-professor Adam Fuerstenberg about 1988, the Canadian Jewish Book Awards began as an independent entity and operated as such for many years, even after it fell some years ago under the auspices of the former Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, which supplied administrative assistance.

Did the committee lose its independence when the Koffler Centre took it over after the BJCC's demise? "That's a good question," Fuerstenberg said. "I don't really remember. I was just told that we were being moved over, but there wasn't anything like an actual written contract that I recall."

The point may be moot, however, since Trapunski indicates the current six-person steering committee would be glad to turn the awards back to the Koffler in 2016. "We're not anti-Koffler in any way," he said. "We just want to fill a void without suspending the awards for a year."

Natalie Kertes, Koffler's director of literary programs and daughter of prominent author Joseph Kertes, said, "I wish them the very best of luck. I'm of the mind that the more support there is out there for Canadian Jewish books, the better the audience numbers will be and the better the book world will be for it. I think, in general, authors deserve as much recognition as they can get."

The Canadian Jewish Literary Awards are being sponsored and administered by York University's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies and partners. Submissions deadline is the end of May and the awards ceremony is slated for Oct. 18. The committee is also seeking donations. Please visit the website cjlawards.ca for more information. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

My pen pal, the jailbird

Lauren Kramer

"Are you ready for Shabbat Hagadol?" The question arrived in the mail, in the monthly letter I receive from my new buddy, a Jewish inmate at a U.S state prison. In his early 40s, he's a much more religious Jew than I am, and his observance is challenged by the hostile environment that surrounds him.

"There's hate and chaos everywhere in here," he confides. "Everything from stabbings and fighting to rape. A lot of ugliness. When I leave my cell, I bring my siddur and tfillin with me, find a quiet corner and recite our prayers twice a day."

From the time I learned to write, I loved having pen pals and would sit for hours, carefully recording my thoughts in letters that would be folded, enveloped, stamped and mailed to different parts of the world. Regrettably, the Internet and email changed all that, and the time and care my pen pals once took to reflect on their lives and send a letter I could touch and hold, evaporated overnight. One by one, we lost touch. The mailman, once a messenger whose satchel promised fabulous insights into the lives of people I loved, became an ordinary guy who delivered bills.

Then I heard about a pen pal program run by the Aleph Institute, which works with the 5,000 Jewish men and women in American prisons. "This is your opportunity to perform a mitzvah for the cost of a postage stamp," the program coaxed.

I was hooked right away, and with a few cautionary steps (I sign with a pseudonym rather than using my real name, and send all correspondence via the institute in Florida, rather than providing my real address) I volunteered to become a pen pal to an inmate who wanted one. My jailbird wrote his first letter within a couple of weeks, and our correspondence began.

I admit that I was relieved to learn he was jailed for fraud rather than murder. I'd rather not delve into the psyche of an individual who killed someone else, and the fraud charge felt softer, safer. We moved quickly from being strangers to a friendship, of sorts, one wherein it felt safe for him to confide the anguish his imprisonment had caused his family and his difficult route from drug addiction to sobriety.

I responded with stories of my weekly goals and challenges, my favourite books and my addiction to the fitness routine P90X. When I re-read my letters, their contents sound more than a little trite compared to the darkness of his daily reality in jail, and I have to remind myself constantly that it was his personal choices that landed him there. No need for me to feel guilty or trite for having made much better choices in my life.

Do I trust him? Well, I like the way my pen pal sounds on paper. He's full of regret and perspective on his past actions, and it touches me profoundly that Judaism brings light and hope into a jail sentence filled with anti-Semitism and repulsive behaviour. I hope that through our letters I can add even a glimmer of more light, a somewhat "normal" voice from the outside world that doesn't judge, belittle or scorn, but rather offers words of kindness, support and camaraderie.

Still, I'm not willing to divulge my real name or contact details. He'll be behind bars a long time, but disclosing my identity carries a risk I'm not willing to take.

Our correspondence delivers a stark contrast between my life and his, reminding me that our Jewish roots don't guide everyone in an ethical or honest direction. Those roots are always there, though, providing a lifeline of spiritual hope and promise, even in the direst environments. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains how innocuous words can hide negative intentions
Rabbi Denise Handlarski reflects on the practical and metaphorical meanings of shmittah
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen wonders why Mount Sinai was chosen as the location for Mattan Torah

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

Why does the Torah instruct us not to harm – lo tonu – our fellow Jew in two separate verses in this week's parshah? (Leviticus, 25:14 and 17)

In explaining the apparent repetition of the same idea, Rashi writes that the first instance refers to mistreating another person in matters of finance. The second concerns wronging someone with words: "that one must not provoke his fellow, nor may one offer advice to him that is unsound for him."

Similarly, when the Torah uses the same words – lo tonu – concerning our treatment of strangers (Leviticus, 19:33), Rashi explains that "one should not taunt the stranger with words." Rashi's example is that one should not remind a convert that he practised another religion in the past.

Why would this example be wronging the convert? Isn't it simply stating fact? It could conceivably even be meant as a compliment to show the growth and journey of the stranger! Perhaps, however, once these words are said, we are dismissing the convert, and reminding them that, in our eyes, they might never be "one of us" when it comes to trust and inclusion.

Maimonides offers another interpretation of wronging someone with words. He writes, "If a question regarding a point of knowledge was raised, one should not ask a person who has never studied that field of knowledge: 'How would you answer this question?' or 'What do you think about this matter?'" (Mechira, 14:14)

The category of ona'at devarim – wronging someone with words – has many different applications. What unifies the interpretations is that the intent of the speaker could be understood in a negative, critical manner. Even if the intent is positive, the effect of the words could be deleterious. Whether we are challenging another in areas of knowledge, speaking to strangers about their history or offering advice in business, innocuous words often hide negative intentions.

The Torah asks us to ensure that our speech, though the words might sound helpful, does not mask malicious motives. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

In this double parshah, we have the rules for leaving the land fallow on the shmittah, the sabbatical year. We know that land requires time to be left fallow in order to maintain good soil quality. But there are ways in which the agricultural can give rise to the cultural. Many of us are considering the idea of shmittah metaphorically, especially now, as we are currently in a shmittah year.

We live in an age when there is a lot of talk of mindfulness, of living in the present moment. And yet, we simultaneously live with the expectations of being able to multitask, of being constantly accessible, and of being able to manage our many roles seamlessly. We are overworked, overcommitted and overwhelmed.

Devices meant to make our lives easier often make us feel that we can never take a break. They are there to enable us to be "connected," and yet I believe there has never been a time in history when people feel less connected to their families and communities.

Shmittah literally means release. What if we released ourselves from some of our fear, guilt and obligation? What if we asked ourselves, "What can I let go of?" Fields that give us food and sustenance, if overworked and overwrought, will stop producing. And we are the same. If we are overworked and overwhelmed then we will be unable to be fully available to those we love. We, too, have a limit.

And in this culture, which measures goodness by productivity, it is good to remind ourselves that rest breeds productivity. Just as the harvest will be better if we rotate our crops and let the land rest, we will be better if we have a chance to rest and recuperate as well. ■

This week's Torah portion is Behar and Bechukotai "Behar" alludes to Mount Sinai, where the Torah was given.

Why is it important to stress that the Torah was given at Mount Sinai? The other mountains boasted about their height and greatness. But God chose Sinai, the smallest and humblest of mountains.

This teaches us to be humble, like Sinai. But then why did God give the Torah on a mountain? He should have given it in a valley, to teach humility.

The lesson is twofold: one needs to be humble, yet one also needs to be proud. We need to be proud Jews. Not arrogant, but proud for being chosen to get the Torah and its mitzvot. The world will respect us when we respect ourselves. We should stand firm like a mountain when facing obstacles.

On the theme of mountains, recently, with the tragedy in Nepal, our community, was notified through social media about a friend, originally from Toronto, married with kids, who was caught in the avalanche of the earthquake when he was climbing near Mt. Everest. We gathered at his parents' home for prayer, and with tears, we recited psalms and gave charity for his safety. For two days, he was missing. Finally, he messaged, "I'm alive and well." He barely missed having huge boulders crash down on him.

How proud and inspired we felt, seeing tiny Israel set up a field hospital to save every life they could in Nepal.

Let's not wait for crises to come together, but let's be united at all times.

As we approach Shavuot, let us re-accept the Torah. Shavuot is likened to the marriage of God and the Jewish People. We got the Torah, our ketubah. Mt. Sinai was our chupah. Let's all be in shul for the Ten Commandments on May 24.

Chag Sameyach. ■

Make Shavuot exotic

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Far East has never been so popular. Asian-inspired food and décor are reaching into all aspects of contemporary life. Exotic "travel" themes are in vogue for all kinds of occasions. Using an Asian theme will transport your Shavuot dinner to another part of the world in just minutes.

A dinner party with a little imagination is a great way to share a journey with friends or family without actually having to make the trip.

You can begin your voyage by considering a few simple ideas. Think about using a rich colour scheme of red, black and gold to infuse the table with richness and flavour. Then add a few traditional accents while remembering that Asian decor is very sleek and minimalist. For the centrepiece, consider using a dark wooden box as a pedestal to hold decorative items – an Asian-style teapot, a glass cylinder vase, either wrapped with a bamboo placemat and filled with palm leaves, or simply filled with water, and presented with a few bamboo stocks.

Many décor items are readily available locally to create an Asian style tabletop: colourful fans, paper lanterns and take-out boxes provide instant ambiance. Offer chopsticks and serve your fare on simple white or clear glass platters. Using these ideas will bring an interesting but pleasant and relaxing mood to your Shavuot dinner.

Chocolate Banana Wontons

- ❑ canola or coconut oil spray
- ❑ 1 large ripe banana, cut into slices
- ❑ 1 milk chocolate bar, approximately 50 g.
- ❑ 24 wonton wrappers
- ❑ 1 tbsp. icing sugar

Prepare a baking sheet with parchment paper or foil. Spray with the oil spray.

Prepare a small fruit nappy with cold water.

Place a slice of banana topped with a 3/4-in. piece of milk chocolate near a corner of the wonton wrap. Wet all the sides of the wonton wrapper with water and fold the wrapper so that the top corner meets the bottom corner. Make sure it is completely sealed. Place on prepared pan. Continue until you have used up the wrappers.

Make sure the wontons do not touch each other on the baking sheet. Spray the tops of the wontons with additional oil spray.

Bake in the oven at 350 for 12 minutes or until edges are golden brown.

When cooled, sift icing sugar over wontons before serving.

Almond Cookie Mini Sundaes

- ❑ 1 cup butter or margarine
- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 1 egg
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. almond extract
- ❑ 1 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 3 cups all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1 egg white, beaten with 1 tsp. water
- ❑ 2 tbsp. sliced almonds
- ❑ ice cream: vanilla, mango, coconut…
- ❑ garnish with berries, sliced almonds and/or shredded coconut

Preheat oven to 325. Prepare baking sheets with parchment paper. In food processor, cream together butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Beat in 1 egg, almond extract, baking powder and salt. Add in the 3 cups of flour. Process until the batter is blended well.

Divide batter into 1-in. balls, or use a mini ice cream scoop. Place cookies 2 inches apart on prepared baking sheets. Lay a sheet of parchment paper over top of the balls of dough and flatten with the bottom of a glass. Brush the top of the cookies with the egg white mixture and sprinkle almond slices on top of the cookie. Bake 12 to 14 minutes or until the cookies begin to turn golden brown. Cool cookies to a wire rack.

When ready to serve, use a mini ice cream scoop to make ice cream balls. Place one ball on top of each almond cookie that you plan to serve. Garnish. ■

Manny Waks: Film blows whistle on yeshiva sex abuse

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thcjn.ca

Manny Waks comes from an Australian Chabad family that has had to leave Chabad after he went public in 2011 with revelations of sexual abuse at Chabad's Yeshivah College in Melbourne. Waks, who has served as vice-president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, also testified at the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse, which included a close look at Yeshivah College. He was in Toronto last week to present Code of Silence, the film about his ordeal which aired at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Tell us about Code of Silence.

Code of Silence is an award-winning documentary undertaken by Danny Ben-Moshe. It won Australia's most prestigious award, the Walkley Award, in December last year.

I'm the main subject, as the victim of child sexual abuse in the Jewish community. I'm often described as a whistleblower. It focused not only on the abuse itself and the subsequent coverup, but it also follows the ongoing intimidation that myself and my family experienced, particularly my parents. It follows their story as well, ultimately culminating in them having to leave Australia.

Where are they now?

They're in Israel. They still spend half the time in Australia. My mom still owns a wig shop, and they still own the house, which is not an easy thing to sell, because it's right across the road from the Yeshivah Centre.

Tell us about the abuse you suffered.

I was 11-years-old. There were two pedophiles in my case. The first is [prominent in the Chabad community]. He abused me for the first time ever on Shavuot night, when it's customary to remain awake all night to study the Torah. He abused me inside the Yeshivah Centre synagogue. Subsequently he abused me several more times in another synagogue where my family and I used to go every week. That lasted about six months. Subsequently, from the age of around 12 to the age of around 14-1/2, I was repeatedly sexually abused by David Cyprys, who's currently sitting in jail for the crimes committed against me and many other boys at the Yeshivah Centre.

What happened to the other guy?

He is in New York. And the police have investigated him. What we're waiting for is further evidence to come forward.

You said the abuse continued until you were 14-1/2. Did you come forward to your parents at that time, or the police?

The only time I shared my abuse with anyone was when I was around 12, in relation to the first perpetrator. I shared it with a classmate. Ultimately he betrayed me. He disclosed my abuse to some of my classmates and within a few days I was being called gay, a poofter – which is a derogatory term for homosexuals.

Manny Waks

How did your family react to this? Did they know what was happening to you?

Until I was 18 I was within the yeshiva framework, which means I was doing religious studies full time. I started to rebel. I guess now, in hindsight, a lot of it probably related to the abuse. I was turning the lights on and off on Shabbat. I was eating non-kosher. I demonstrated complete disinterest in my bar mitzvah.

And the response of my parents and the school was really about trying to push me to become even more Orthodox and focus on religious studies.

But you didn't mention to them that you were abused?

No. I shared it with a friend and I saw the consequences of sharing that. But it was clear that a lot of people in the school environment, in the Yeshivah Centre, were aware of the abuse, not just the students, but in some cases also the adults, in some cases the teachers. People were calling me names and rumours were circulating that I had been abused.

What did you do next?

At the age of 18, I wanted to escape from that community, that lifestyle, so I made aliyah to Israel with the aim of going into the Israel Defence Forces.

When I was 20, my sister was getting married. I had a month's leave to go to Australia, visit my family and go to that wedding. When I was there, I happened to hear on the radio that a police operation was addressing child sexual abuse. I remember them saying if you have any information to please come forward.

Right after that I went to my father and shared what happened to me and he called the police., which to his credit is not something that necessarily happens in the ultra-Orthodox world. Often, they start asking questions about how much they believe you and even if they believe you. There are [stories] that parents try to encourage the child not to go to the police, that they'll deal with it or it really didn't happen.

What explains that denial response?

I think there are multiple reasons. Some genuinely believe in the concept of mesirah, which is about handing over a fellow Jew to the authorities or telling on them. This comes from eastern Europe when the pogroms and anti-Semitism were rife. Often the entire community would bear the brunt of these allegations.

Other reasons are that it may bring trouble to the family. In other cases, it's about trying to protect the victim. You won't have good marriage prospects, for example. Your whole life will be ruined, you'll be seen as a victim.

What happened to the abusers?

I went to the police when I was 20 in 1996. The first perpetrator was overseas already at the time, so they couldn't interview him. David Cyprys, they could interview him and at that stage it was my word against his. So for lack of evidence, they left the case open pending further evidence that might came to light.

At the same time I went to the head rabbi of the Yeshivah Centre, the late Rabbi Yitzchok Groner, and his response was they were aware of the allegations about him, they were dealing with it. Essentially he urged me not to take any actions against him.

Did they do anything about it?

In 2000 I went to Rabbi Groner a second time. I had a conversation in his office, which I remember vividly. The way the conversation ended was that he made it clear they were addressing it, that Cyprys was seeing someone, a psychologist, there are improvements.

Did more victims came forward?

In 2011, I read an article that the police were looking at historical cases at the Yeshivah Centre and in particular they were looking to extradite David Kramer from the United States.

Kramer was a U.S. and Israeli citizen who had been brought to the Yeshivah Centre around 1990 to be a teacher. Basically, he turned out to be a pedophile. The allegations were that he sexually abused 50-60 children.

As soon as the allegations surfaced, my father acknowledged that two of my brothers were victims of Kramer as well.

As soon as the Yeshivah Centre heard about it, their initial response was to do nothing. Subsequently, at a meeting, parents were threatening to go to the police, the Yeshivah Centre stepped in and decided to send him overseas.

They sent the problem elsewhere?

That's exactly right. They sent him to Israel with his family – he had about 10 children – and he was someone else's problem. Soon after he went to America, to St. Louis, where he re-offended.

Was he ever extradited to Australia?

He was extradited to Australia and ultimately four victims came forward in his case, including two of my brothers.

When I saw that police were looking to extradite him to Australia, that's when I felt, I have a leadership role. I'm a victim myself of two perpetrators. If I don't come forward publicly about this issue, to address it appropriately, no one else would.

It became a front page newspaper article in one of Australia's most prominent publications, in The Age newspaper.

After that, I was inundated by victims, media, people around the world, community leaders and victims and family members of victims who shared their stories. People were genuinely shocked.

Did you get responses from other yeshivahs around the world?

I had people contacting me on that day and subsequently from ultra-Orthodox yeshivas all over the world. I also had people from modern Orthodox and progressive communities and elsewhere. I had secular Jews contact me to say good on you for speaking out on this issue. It's about time. We all know it happens in our community and we need to address it.

How did all this affect your faith and your Judaism?

I went through an evolution of sorts. I was at one period very anti-religious. Now, it's live and let live. I respect and admire many rabbis and I have close relations with many rabbis.

What speaks to me is that my Jewish identity has been strong and remains strong. I am a proud Jew and a proud Zionist, but I can call out when rabbis do the wrong thing. No one is above the law. No one is above reproach and when we do things that are inappropriate, we need to be held to account. ■

The agunah of Odessa

Backstory

RABBI YIRMIYA MILEVSKY

There is no greater mitzvah than trying to find a way, within the halachic system, to free the agunah, a woman who is "chained" to her marriage.

When rabbis try to resolve agunah cases, they face challenges. Sometimes the challenges are circumstantial, other times they are halachic. And in some situations, politics is the great impediment. Such was the sad story of the agunah of Odessa in 1884.

After 36-year-old Michel Alter Genner died of typhus, his young wife Sarah started to rebuild her life. A local rabbi informed her that since the couple was childless, she was required to perform chalitzah – a ritual that involves the taking off of a brother-in-law's shoe by the widow, through which she becomes free to marry whomever she desires – before she could marry anyone else.

After some research, it became clear that Alter Genner had a brother, Philip Duptchak, a Christian convert. Sarah turned to the local preacher and the official rabbi of the town, Rabbi Shimon Aryeh Schwabacher, for help. The rabbi contacted Duptchak, who in turn informed Rabbi Schwabacher that he could not participate in a Jewish ritual without permission from the Russian Orthodox Church, who told Rabbi Schwabacher that since Duptchak was now a practising Christian he could not perform any ritual associated with another faith.

Rabbi Schwabacher next turned to the learned Rabbi Avraham Yoel Abelson, who was living temporarily in Odessa. Rabbi Abelson ruled that Sarah was free to marry without a chalitzah. He based his reasoning on a minority Jewish opinion that the rule does not exist when the living brother is an apostate. In addition, since at the time of marriage Sarah made it clear that she did not want to enter into the relationship with her husband if indeed he had a brother who was an apostate, the marriage was a "mistaken acquisition" and retroactively null and void.

Rabbi Abelson recognized that his ruling was a novelty and sent it to other great scholars for concurrence. The most recognized was the rabbi of Kovno, Rabbi Yitzchak Elchanan Spektor, considered the preeminent halachic authority of his time. In late 1885, Rabbi Abelson informed Rabbi Schwabacher that he had received several letters from prominent rabbis, including Rabbi Spektor, agreeing with his ruling. It seemed Sarah Genner would now be free to remarry.

Although Rabbi Schwabacher was the official rabbi in Odessa, he was viewed with skepticism by the more traditional elements in town. And when they got word of the lenient ruling, they claimed that prior to Rabbi Schwabacher's involvement they had made contact with Duptchak. They claimed he was willing to perform the chalitzah if paid appropriately.

As a result, letters were sent from a group of rabbis in Odessa to all the great rabbis who agreed with Rabbi Abelson, demanding that they retract their decision. Based on published letters sent back to Odessa from rabbis responding to this group, it seems several threats, including financial repercussions, were issued as well. Sources indicate that Rabbi Abelson suffered verbal and even physical abuse from the parties who were against him. Yet the most significant blow to his cause was a letter of retraction from Rabbi Spektor.

Rabbi Schwabacher, in his capacity as the official rabbi, permitted Sarah Genner to remarry without a chalitzah. The dissenting rabbis reacted by declaring publicly in the synagogues of the town that according to Jewish law Sarah was prohibited from marrying. The saga continued, with the differing rabbis being charged in court, and found guilty, for proclaiming a ruling against Rabbi Schwabacher.

Reviewing sad chapters in our history serve no purpose if we do not learn from them. By looking back at the fights of our past, hopefully we can inspire ourselves not to repeat them. ■

WILLS & SOLICITORS' NEGLIGENCE

The June 2, 2015 B'nai Brith Canada's Estates and Trusts Group upcoming seminar will, in part, address solicitor's negligence claims. This is a very important topic given that approximately 7% of all law suits against lawyers relate to estates.

Charles Wagner

The format of the seminar will be a moot trial. In our scenario, an elderly illiterate woman speaks only Russian and Yiddish. She met with a lawyer played by Heather Hogan of Whaley Estate Litigation. The first meeting lasted 10 minutes with the lawyer schmoozing and then taking instructions. The second meeting took 15 minutes. The lawyer schmoozed, translated the documents and witnessed them being signed. No questions were asked about her health, or about the size of the assets, the reason for disinheriting one child or why she transferred her house only to the son. The disinherited daughter says that had the lawyer asked proper questions she would have recognized that her client neither had capacity nor understood or approved of the will. Moreover, there were the red flags of undue influence. For example, the person who was inheriting everything was the one who brought his mother to the office and was there when his mother was giving instructions. The new will was totally different from past wills which split everything equally. Evidence suggests that mother had Alzheimer's, couldn't ever remember her name, what she owned and that she had a daughter. Ms Hogan's lawyer will argue that Heather knew the testator for many years, that she satisfied herself that the testator's memory was fine and that the documents were so simple that anyone would have understood their meaning.

Heather Hogan

Craig Vander Zee

In our moot court, Craig Vander Zee of Torkin Manes LLP will be examining Ms Hogan in chief and Ian Hull of Hull & Hull LLP will be cross examining her. That should be very interesting given that Ian Hull and Craig Vander Zee are both certified as specialists by the Law Society. The exercise will be very helpful to highlight steps that should be taken by the drafting lawyer and demonstrate how a seasoned estate litigator conducts cross examinations.

Ian Hull

The event will take place on June 2nd, 2015 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8. Registration is at 7:30am and the moot court will begin at 8:00am. The event is open to lawyers and accountants. Those lawyers and/or accountants interested in attending may contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca . Charles B. Wagner, of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP, is a certified specialist in Estates & Trusts Law. He chairs the Estate and Trusts Group, Lawyers Division of Bnai Brith that created and runs this annual continuing legal education program for professionals dealing with estate and trust issues.

WJC to honour Woman in Gold star, and Israelis tout new approach to pot

Education award for Mirren

Oscar-winning actress Helen Mirren will get an award for helping to educate the public about Nazi-looted art. The World Jewish Congress said May 12 that the star of the film Woman in Gold will receive the inaugural WJC Recognition Award later this year. The film tells the story of Maria Altmann, an Austrian-American woman who made headlines in 2006 for winning her legal battle against the Austrian government to reclaim five Gustav Klimt paintings, among them the famous Portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer I, nicknamed Woman in Gold. Following its restitution to her, the painting was acquired by WJC president Ronald Lauder and has gone on display at the Neue Galerie in Manhattan.

High time to decriminalize marijuana?

Israel's top cop says it's time to rethink his country's pot laws. "More and more citizens are demanding marijuana use be permitted," Yohanan Danino told high school students last week in Beit Shemesh. "I think it's time for the police, along with the state, to re-evaluate its traditional position." A number of MKs have spoken out in support of decriminalization or legalization, including at a Tel Aviv march earlier this month. Danino said he's spoken to several new MKs and advised them to re-examine the current policy.

More than just a Peeping Tom

In addition to secretly recording women undressing at his shul's mikvah, Rabbi Barry Freundel engaged in sexual encounters with several women and videotaped them, prosecutors say. That's one of several new details about the mikvah-peeping rabbi to emerge from two documents filed in a Washington, D.C., court May 8 – one each by the prosecution and the defence – that shed new light on Rabbi Freundel's behaviour and offer some particulars about his life since his arrest last fall, including that he has resumed some rabbinic teaching. Rabbi Freundel has pleaded guilty to 52 counts of voyeurism for installing secret cameras in the shower room of the mikvah at Kesher Israel, the prominent Orthodox synagogue he led for 25 years. ■

Obama no friend to Israel

Mordechai Ben-Dat is absolutely correct ("A shameful moral silence on Iran," May 7). The conduct of the Obama administration has been shameful on just about every front since U.S. President Barack Obama first took office in 2009. Obama's overt campaign to undermine Israel's security, coupled with his determined efforts to weaken America's standing on the international stage, has increasingly put the (erstwhile) free world in danger.

Disquietingly, this behaviour could not have been sustained without it having been tacitly approved, aided and abetted by a herd-like acquiescence on the part of about half the American electorate.

Of equal concern for Israel is that a large proportion of America's Jewish population has persistently sided with this charlatan and generally stood in line with the left wing of American politics.

Clearly, Israel can no longer rely on the United States being its steadfast prime ally and must fend for itself. Ironically, the leading Gulf Arab states, led by Saudi Arabia, are now allies of Israel in a concerted effort to contain Iran.

We can be thankful that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is the polar opposite to Obama and that he will continue to do whatever is necessary to ensure Israel's survival. The world community, including the United States, will ultimately come to learn that its salvation has been secured by Israel's survival.

The joy of Shabbat

In response to Daniel Held's article ("What's the most powerful form of Jewish education?" May 14), I agree that the home plays an important part in a child's Jewish education, just as the school does.

I want to articulate one point, though, regarding Shabbat. Held states that a family's decision "to go together to synagogue, celebrate Shabbat" etc. all have a profound effect on a child. In the Torah, it states emphatically "shamor et ha Shabbat" often translated as guard, or keep the Sabbath. Nowhere does it say to "celebrate" Shabbat.

Teaching children what it means to "keep" the Sabbath is fundamental to Judaism, and I believe to Jewish continuity. Though in many circles keeping Shabbat may seem onerous, the truth is far from it. By not participating in so many activities we normally do participate in, we are giving ourselves a mini vacation. In fact, Shabbat is an incredible gift we should all cherish, and when it is "kept" properly, it does indeed carry the spirit of celebration to which Held refers.

Marrying within the faith

Rabbi Elizabeth Bolton's article is truly disturbing ("Is there a future for intermarried rabbis?" May 7.) It's time to get our heads out of the sand and realize what is happening to our Jewish faith.

Intermarriage rates are unprecedented. Day school enrolment is declining, and synagogue attendance is at an all-time low. Does she truly think that allowing rabbis to intermarry will make things better?

The survival of the Jewish faith is dependent on couples marrying within the faith and having Jewish babies who will, in time, have Jewish babies. Let's be clear: a child born to a non-Jewish woman is not Jewish. If you want to save our faith, then marry a Jewish woman and have Jewish children. It's that simple.

Pondering the Green Line

To answer Mira Sucharov ("Why is the Green Line not on our schools' maps?" May 7), the only reason to put the Green Line on a map today is to show where the armistice line between Israel and Jordanian-occupied Palestine stood for 19 years. It is a matter of history, just as one could put on a map the legal borders created by the UN partition plan, which stood for 19 minutes.

There is almost no physical evidence of the Green Line left in the Holy Land today, and it will never again be a border between anything. I certainly hope I will see a two-state peace in what I have left of my life, but I am far from optimistic. However, if it does happen, the border will not be the Green Line. It will be negotiated.

Incidentally, in Palestinian schools it is not shown either. The Holy Land is one country called Palestine.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Are bar and bat mitzvahs created equal?

Egalitarianism is crucial to liberal Judaism, but Orthodoxy differentiates between girls' and boys' rites of passage out of a belief in the Torah's unique roles for each gender

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: Recently, these pages have spurred conversation about the phenomenon of group bnot mitzvah. Our congregation currently is re-examining what it means for young people to become bnei mitzvah in our community, and we are asking lots of questions about what we want the kids to learn, what expectations we have of them and what we can offer them.

In all this discussion, one point of absolute agreement has been the commitment to egalitarianism: we ask of our girls what we ask of our boys. Both our boys and our girls become bnei mitzvah individually at services, and both read from the Torah. They always rise to the occasion. In Montreal, though, we are well aware that many families choose group bnot mitzvah for the daughters, through their day schools or other community institutions. I'm curious as to your thinking on this issue.

Rabbi Korobkin: We're worlds apart on this one.

In liberal Judaism, the 11th commandment is, "Thou shalt be egalitarian." In traditional Judaism, the differences between the genders don't just stop with physiology and morphology, but run far deeper in the way we function, the way we think and the way we relate to God.

As we approach Shavuot, we can look at how the Torah was presented to the Jews at Mount Sinai. The Talmud teaches that God offered the Torah separately to each gender – women first and then men – precisely because of the differentiated roles of men and women in the home, community and synagogue. So while egalitarianism is an overriding concern for you, our shul differentiates between bnei and bnot mitzvah precisely because of the Torah's unique respective assignments to men and women.

That said, we do our utmost to individually highlight the unique talents and achievements of each and every bar and bat mitzvah. We make every effort to ensure that no one feels "less than" or "more than."

Rabbi Grushcow: It seems to me that you are presenting the conversation as follows: your approach to Judaism is true to the Torah, while mine is shaped by external values. But as we both know, there is more than one way to understand the Torah.

Two examples leap to mind. First, the Creation story. There are actually two: one, with both man and woman made simultaneously in the image of God, and the other, with Eve formed from Adam's side. This tells us that there were different understandings of gender even at the beginning of human history.

Second, I am always struck by how Moses' instructions to the Israelites as they prepare for revelation vary from the instructions given by God. Moses says the people (here, addressing the men) must not go near a woman. God says nothing of the sort. This passage suggests that all this focus on gender may be a human invention, rather than divine intention.

If Torah is central to our shared tradition, how can we say that a girl not reading from the Torah at a bat mitzvah is not "less than" a boy reading Torah at a bar mitzvah? Where else do we accept "separate but equal" as an answer?

Rabbi Korobkin: If the sole focal point of religious life were the synagogue and only boys were called to the Torah and not girls, then you'd be right.

But traditionally, there are three focal forums of religious expression: the home, the study hall and the synagogue. The synagogue, which is the forum for public prayer, is the least important of the three. In the study hall (or school), girls have the same opportunity as boys to excel in their religious studies. And the home is the purview primarily of the Jewish woman, who maintains the religious environment and spiritual warmth necessary to foster Judaism and Jewish identity for her entire family. It is that role which is the most important of all, and that is why girls are not "less than" when they don't read from the Torah in shul.

The fact that the Jewish woman's role is so vital to the continuity of our people is precisely why God offered the Torah to the women first, knowing that their role in perpetuating Judaism would be the more important of the two gender-specific assignments. Looked upon in this light, the modern-day pantheon of "equality" is truly a non sequitur. ■

Our favourite Jewish texts

Ahead of Shavuot, I asked my CJN colleagues about their favourite Jewish texts. Some are classics you'll immediately recognize, while others are decidedly less traditional. Either way, if you're planning to stay up all night studying on the first night of the holiday, you might want to consider these texts.

Sheri Shefa, reporter: "Who is wise? One who learns from every man… Who is strong? One who overpowers his inclinations… Who is rich? One who is satisfied with his lot… Who is honourable? One who honours his fellows" (Ethics of the Fathers, 4:1). This Mishnah touches on universal human desires – to be open-minded, to achieve lasting happiness and inner peace, to be respected and valued by ones peers and loved ones, and to be humble enough to respect and value everyone around you.

Lila Sarick, reporter/proofreader: "May the Lord bless you and keep you. May the Lord make His face shine on you and be gracious to you. May the Lord turn His face toward you and give you peace" (Numbers 6:24-26). It's the brachah I give my kids on Friday night. I bless my daughter in the name of the matriarchs and my boys in the names of Ephraim and Menashe.

Carolyn Blackman, supplements editor: Hirsh Glick's Zog Nisht Keynmol. Ever since I was a child at Workmen's Circle Camp Yungvelt, this song has been a symbol of strength and optimism to me.

Ella Burakowski (aka Ask Ella): "A righteous man falls down seven times and gets up" (Proverbs, 24:16). It's all about picking yourself up, dusting yourself off and rising to the challenge. It's not as much about the result as it is about the journey.

Elias Levy, reporter: Tractate Shabbat, 88A. A powerful reflection on the issue of liberty. We find in the choices given by God to the Jewish People as they stood at Sinai a dilemma that humanity still faces today: the challenge of making important choices in life that change the future.

Jodie Shupac, reporter: Transparent. This television drama tells the story of three adult children of a Jewish family struggling to come to terms with their father's new identity as a woman. Transparent gives a more nuanced picture of secular Jews navigating the complex interplay between traditional family values and personal freedoms and pleasures.

And three of my personal favourites:

Shmirat Halashon*, Rabbi Israel Meir Kagan: A compendium of the laws of lashon hara (evil speech), this is a text I keep coming back to, because it's so fundamental to human relationships. An essential reminder of the great power of language.

"For there is no righteous man on earth who does good and sins not." (Ecclesiastes, 7:20): This text suggests that not only is imperfection inevitable, it might even be a good thing. The way I read it, in order to become righteous, one must sin along the way.

As A Driven Leaf*, Milton Steinberg: A historical novel about the life of Elisha ben Abuyah, the rabbinic sage who committed heresy and was expunged from the Talmud. The story implicitly asks how we reconcile Judaism and the modern world. We're still searching for the answer.

Schools struggle with social media apps and lashon hara

Hannah Ziegler

Is the rise of social media encouraging Jewish young people to engage in activities such as bullying and lashon hara that go against the values they're learning in Jewish day schools?

With apps that are predominately used anonymously – such as Ask.fm, which has grown in popularity over the last few years and now has 150 million users worldwide, and Yik Yak, an app that also boasts millions of monthly users and has recently sparked controversy in schools globally – the problem is growing.

Yik Yak in particular has come in for scrutiny in many schools after a number of recent incidents. One public high school in Ottawa went into lockdown last January after someone posted a message on Yik Yak that there was a gun on the premises, and there have also been multiple fire-alarm pranks linked to the app, in which students said they'd pull the alarms if enough people liked their posts.

The app allows users to anonymously post updates that can be viewed by anyone within a 10-mile radius. Posts, including negative and hurtful ones, can be "up-voted" or "down-voted." If a negative post gets at least five "up votes," it will remain visible, while posts that get a minimum of five "down votes" are deleted.

Anonymous apps like Yik Yak, which are very popular among teens, have been implicated in cases of bullying and suicide in a number of high-profile cases in the United States.

As a result, some high schools have banned their use, either by blocking them from a school's WiFi network or by using so-called "geofences" that prevent their use in certain geographic areas.

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto set up a geofence this past winter to block Yik Yak in order to head off problems with bullying and lashon hara.

Students say they have mixed feelings about the move.

One Grade 12 student at TanenbaumCHAT's Wilmington campus who asked to remain anonymous believes social media apps in general allow teens to exercise their freedom of speech, and anonymous ones let shy people be more open with their views. "There are a lot of positives to social media – we're globally connected, we have instant communications, and so many talented people have platforms for projects they never would have been able to afford otherwise," she says.

But she also admits that apps such as Yik Yak can be harmful, yet still thinks teens can exercise good judgment.

"[These apps] are awful, and they do contradict the Jewish values we learn, but using the morals we have learned, we should decide ourselves what constitutes a good or bad act."

Another TanenbaumCHAT Grade 12 student agrees social media apps can be a positive or negative force, depending on how they're used. "Social media is a great way to keep up with people who you're not in the same city with, and you are able to get news right away," he says.

But although he likes the anonymity of Yik Yak, he recognizes that it's often used for cyber-bullying. "There is no good that can come out of it," he says.

Karen Sitnik, Judaic studies principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin campus in Thornhill, says that anonymous cyber-bullying even occurs among younger children.

"Kids have phones and do stuff anonymously in grades 4 and 5," she says. "Because it's anonymous, people think they can hide behind it, and suddenly someone who might have been more quiet is saying things because they think they can't get caught."

Sitnik says Associated has strict anti-bullying policies and a "technology usage plan" that both parents and students sign and limits Internet use at schools to academic purposes only, but the anonymous nature of Yik Yak and similar apps can make it very hard to identify bullies.

Social media expert Randall Craig, author of seven books and president of the Internet consulting firm 108 ideaspace, says part of the problem is that parents don't always understand the technology their kids are using. "Who teaches who about how to use social media apps and sites? Very often parents might not be aware of all the things that their children can do," he says.

Another problem for parents is keeping up with the latest trends.

According to Craig, there are currently more than 500 social networking apps and sites. "There are new ones that pop up every day and old ones that close every day. And while apps like Snapchat, WhatsApp and Yik Yak might be popular now, [we] have to realize how fickle social media is."

Tamara Rebick, co-director of student activities and Israel engagement [illegible] TanenbaumCHAT's south campus, admits that it may be "hard to foresee what the next app of the day will be," but parents and educators must try to stay current.

Also, technology education should start early, she says. "In terms of teaching values I think that is something that starts at the core, like kindergarten, and I just want to use Jewish values as a teaching method that has to start in the beginning in the Jewish day school system, so by the time you get to being old enough to have your own phone, you know what to do with it."

Sitnik agrees, emphasizing that the earlier kids are taught how to use apps responsibly, the better.

Her advice to parents? "Sit with your kids and teach them. It's really about education and proper teaching, because the phones aren't going away, so we need to use them as a tool to improve our education."

Rebick also believes social media can have a positive effect in building a school community. "For example, last year we created a hashtag for our Shabbatons, and just creating a forum for pictures of the Shabbaton helps Grade 9 students who don't know what to expect take a look at [them], and it helps open up the eyes to the community that's waiting."

Avital Aharon, director of educational technology at TanenbaumCHAT, says she doesn't think social media apps are necessarily in conflict with Jewish values.

"Jewish values are not against social media. Jewish values are about sharing. It's OK to share, but you have to do that responsibly. You have to know how to do that in a positive way and prevent lashon hara." ■

Torah for all: Shavuot's lesson for modern-day Judaism

Allowing the minority but powerful Israeli chief rabbinate to control religious observance is alienating too many Jews, rabbi argues

RABBI DAVID STAV
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Among the Jewish holidays known as the Shalosh Regalim, (the Three Festivals), Shavuot has somewhat of lonely sibling status.

Whereas Pesach and Sukkot come with a specific set of laws and traditions, Shavuot is largely lacking in such a character (with the exception, of course, of the well-known custom to eat dairy foods during the holiday). On the surface, Shavuot is primarily defined by the requirement to refrain from many activities, much as we do on Shabbat. There are a limited number of positive commandments linked to the holiday.

But to approach Shavuot from this superficial perspective would risk missing the meaning behind the holiday. In fact, inherent in Shavuot are messages that make it a festival positioned at the very centre of our Jewish identity.

Above all, Shavuot teaches that the Torah given on Mount Sinai thousands of years ago is as relevant today as ever. Beyond that, the ultimate understanding that we must glean from Shavuot is how the Torah and our Jewish identity relate to each and every Jew in his or her individual way.

> In the Jewish world of today, there is a growing alienation toward the ideal of the Torah's universality.

There is an often-cited commentary espousing that the soul of every Jew throughout the ages was present when the Torah was given at Sinai. Regardless of how literally one chooses to interpret this lesson, the more important takeaway is that the Torah was not intended for one Jew or another. Rather it was designed for every Jew, to be embraced and internalized by us all.

In the Jewish world of today, there is a growing alienation toward the ideal of the Torah's universality. People fail to recognize that the Torah is a living document that relates to each and every one of us. And as a result, large groups of our population are made to feel unwelcome and inferior. They are being driven further and further away from Jewish heritage.

In Israel in 2015, this divisiveness represents one of the most dangerous threats to our nation's future. There are certainly those who would think that such a statement is a gross exaggeration in a world where Iranian nuclear missiles are developed to ensure our destruction. Without mitigating those dangers, I would argue that the "spiritual threat" is potentially far more dangerous, because it is allowed to intensify without enough people taking proper notice.

Specifically in today's Israel, all too many aspects of religious governance have been transferred into the hands of the small but powerful minority of the chief rabbinate. Issues like marriage and divorce, conversion and kashrut supervision are in its central control – a situation that may be even further exacerbated following this most recent Knesset election and the forming of a governing coalition. Sadly, the perspective of a select cadre of rabbis and haredi politicians all too often ignores the long-term interests of the Jewish People.

This is the exact opposite of the lesson of Shavuot: the Torah cannot be a limiting document. Rather, it must be for all Jews. If we fail to heed this lesson, we will alienate more and more Jews from observance and respect for their Jewish identities. This, in turn, will lead to a situation where, increasingly, many will choose to marry outside of their religion entirely or outside of Halachah. These developments could end up denying us a sizable Jewish future in the State of Israel. The result will be that the Jewish state as we know it will no longer exist.

Regardless of where in the world a Jew lives, he or she always looks toward Israel as the source of hope for the Jewish future. Regrettably, this cornerstone of our religion is at risk if Israel is not given the chance to change its direction on how the Jewish future of our homeland will develop. This is the ultimate lesson of Shavuot.

Now is the time to recognize that the Torah and its observance must be made accessible to all so that everyone can see its beauty and keep its laws. For this is what will allow our nation to continue to thrive and serve as an eternal light onto the nations. ■

Native-Jewish partnership focuses on health

Avrum Rosensweig

I write this article while visiting native reserves in the Kenora, Ont., region. We are staying in a Super 8 Motel, and a sign outside says: "Burton Cummings performing. Tickets inside. Cool!"

I am here with Hanita Tiefenbach and Leah Silverman, Ve'ahavta staff. Our goals are to strengthen our relationship with the Kenora Chiefs Advisory, a group composed of several chiefs; familiarize ourselves with the reserves we will be working with; and integrate two health promotions fellows through our Briut program.

Briut, which means "health" or "wellness," is funded by the Ontario Trillium Foundation. It is a three-year program run in partnership with the Kenora Chiefs Advisory. The program is Ve'ahavta's first Jewish-Aboriginal program.

Among the communities affiliated with the Kenora Chiefs Advisory are Shoal Lake 40 First Nations, Ochiichagwe'Babigo'Ining First Nation, Grassy Narrows First Nations, Naotkamegwanning First Nation, Wabaseemoong Independent First Nation, Obashkaandagaang First Nation, Wauzhushk Onigum First Nation and Northwest Angle 33.

Kenora is beautiful. It is set on Lake of the Woods and has a reputation for some of the best boating and fishing in the world. I arrived here in the rain, on Bearskin Airlines' turbo prop plane with 18 seats. On the way to Kenora, we first landed in Dryden and Fort Francis, small Northern Ontario "shtetls."

It was a tad harrowing, as the winds were strong and I suffer from agoraphobia. But I made it and my knuckles are intact.

The hospitality we have experienced through our partners has been Abrahamic in nature. Last Tuesday, we celebrated the spring solstice at Dalles Indian Reserve, which has 200 residents. The sound of the drums went right through me, and the gifts we received from Chief Lorraine Cobiness, an Ojibway native, were lovely. We raised the gifts to the Creator in sync with the rhythm of the beats as we danced in a circle.

> We are doing incredible things in times of crisis
> Chief Howard Kabestra

Paula Broeders, a Ve'ahavta fellow, will operate out of the Dalles Reserve.

We also visited Whitefish Reserve, or Naotkamegwanning First Nation. Our host was Chief Howard Kabestra. It is there that our second fellow, Dr. Jennifer Wesley, an Aboriginal medical doctor, will work. She will be the first native doctor working on the reserve.

We were introduced to their health centre by Kabestra, who stated proudly that the community also has a women's shelter. The chief pointed out that the health centre has received an Accreditation Canada stamp of approval – "a big deal" for them.

Whitefish has the Black River Youth Camp, where the children learn about their culture, including drumming, dancing and fishing.

"We are doing incredible things in times of crisis," Kabestra said. "All of this fresh out of residential school."

His statement is a compelling one because it reflects clarity about his and his people's history and a level of hope and pride one would not necessarily expect from a native community.

Through my trip, however, I have discovered a number of dynamic leaders, including chiefs Cobiness and Kabestra, individuals who work hard on behalf of their people.

I have also discovered some very special personalities and am excited about our Jewish-Aboriginal initiatives. I look forward to learning from our native counterparts and sharing with them the beauty of the Jewish People. ■

Honouring a gitte neshamah

Bernie Farber

In my last column I spoke of what brought me to the work I am doing today. I promised to follow this up with more on the Jewish-First Nations bond.

Full disclosure, I work for a gitte neshamah (a good soul), Michael Dan. He is a neurosurgeon, philanthropist, and First Nations advocate. In 2002, he created the Paloma Foundation that I now help run, which has donated more than $8 million to charities in the Toronto area (with a special emphasis on health, education and homelessness).

Through his support of the University of Haifa and the Michael and Amira Dan Professorship in Global Health at the University of Toronto, he has helped to build Jewish-Palestinian dialogue and tolerance in Canada and around the world.

Along with all these accomplishments, today his work is focused on indigenous health. In 2014, Michael donated $10 million to U of T to create the first privately endowed institute for indigenous health research in the world at the Dalla Lana School of Public Health. I wish he didn't have to do so, but with the recent slashing of Aboriginal health research budgets, we desperately needed a privately endowed research facility that will never be beholden to the whims of any federal government.

On March 23, the Institute for Indigenous Health had an Aboriginal "naming ceremony." Present were First Nations, Metis and Inuit chiefs, thought leaders, academics, physicians, nurses and many others to whom indigenous health has a special meaning. Greetings came from former prime minister Paul Martin, whose own work funding Aboriginal education has become legendary. We heard from Ontario's Aboriginal Affairs Minister David Zimmer and probably the single most recognized and respected First Nations leader in the country, former national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, Phil Fontaine.

It was a memorable evening, led by Anishnabe elder Fred Kelly and midewin (medicine man) Kalvin Ottertail and his wife Margaret. We also heard from representatives of the Metis and Inuit communities. Drumming, a smudging ceremony and First Nations circle dances all came together in a powerful evening to create the Waakebiness-Bryce Institute for Indigenous Health.

Waakebiness is Anisshinaabemowin for "radiant thunderbird" and was the name bestowed upon Dan by Ottertail, who is a member of the Lac Lacroix First Nations.

The Bryce Institute pays tribute to Dr. Peter Henderson Bryce, who served as chief medical officer of health for the Department of Indian Affairs in the early part of the 20th century. It was Bryce who uncovered and publicly reported the horrendous facts pertaining to the deaths of thousands of young First Nations children in residential schools from tuberculosis.

Sadly, Bryce failed to convince the government of the day to take simple measures from better ventilation of schools to more sufficient nutrition to bring down the numbers of deaths. When the government refused to act, Bryce went public with his findings and published The Story of a National Crime: Being a Record of the Health Conditions of the Indians of Canada from 1904 to 1921.

Said Dan of this honour: "I'm tremendously proud that this Institute will pay tribute to my indigenous friends while recognizing Dr. Peter Bryce's courageous attempt at saving indigenous children from the ravages of tuberculosis."

And I was proud to be part of such a significant ceremony, standing shoulder to shoulder with many members of the Jewish community, including my friend Len Rudner, representing the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

It was not a surprise to me that Jews and First Nations stood together that evening. Indeed, Kelly, Fontaine and I met more than 10 years ago, when as CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress and along with then-president of CJC Ed Morgan, I led a contingent of First Nations leaders to Israel. That trip solidified a friendship that years later helped inaugurate an initiative funded by a Jewish philanthropist that will immeasurably help First Nations people to better health. ■

What to expect, and not expect, from rabbis

Rabbi Dow Marmur

A common cause of unhappiness in interpersonal relations is unrealistic expectations. This is also true in relationships between communities and their rabbis. A recent advertisement for an Orthodox rabbinic position – obviously only men need apply – in a European capital provides a telling illustration.

According to the lengthy job description, the successful candidate will not only lead services, preside at life-cycle events, teach, counsel and engage in community-building. In addition to his priestly role, he must also be a "visionary leader able to actively engage more people in the Orthodox way of living and facilitate bringing people back to Judaism."

His many pastoral duties range from "visiting the sick and elderly" to "attending (and initiating) social activities."

Beyond rabbinic ordination, the incumbent is to have engaged in advanced Torah studies and have a solid secular education.

The job description also states that he should have "an Orthodox and traditional family upbringing." It's apparently not enough for him to have embraced Orthodoxy later in life. The good rabbi should be frum from birth.

The skills required include the ability to teach, speak in public, be media savvy and have "general knowledge that can be connected to Jewish subjects." Psychology and history are mentioned specifically.

The successful applicant must be mature and have a "high level of integrity." He should be "comfortable with himself" and know how to "resolve conflicts in a positive and constructive fashion." He must have an "open disposition," be "flexible, diplomatic, patient" and skilled in creating "win-win situations." Most rabbis I know, myself included, are neurotic. They needn't apply.

Though the rabbi is to represent the community to the outside world, he's not allowed to say what he thinks: "The rabbi's freedom of speech is circumscribed." Because the community isn't only Orthodox, when the new incumbent "takes a position in controversial issues, the other denominations' opinions must be presented."

One enigmatic statement in the job description is that "the rabbi is obligated to inform the board about possible religious convictions that deviate from the Orthodox norms." It's not clear whether periodically the rabbi must go to confession before lay leaders or to report on the deviant thoughts and practices of others.

The city is said to have more than 10,000 Jews, but even on High Holidays less than 2,000 attend services. The job description implies it. Because "the number of members is decreasing," the candidate is challenged to "attract more members to the community." It's up to him to increase attendance by being relevant and able to "address the needs of young people and others who currently do not always attend synagogue regularly." Obviously if Jews don't come to shul, it's the rabbi's fault.

And if all that wasn't enough, there's this: "The rabbi is expected to have an open home and invite people for Shabbat and other holidays." It's not specified who will do the cooking.

The full text of the ad and others like it should be studied in every rabbinic school and in every synagogue as an indicator of why the relationship between rabbis, cantors and teachers on the one hand and lay leaders on the other is often so problematic. Though the wording of this particular text may be idiosyncratic, the expectations it lists are, alas, not uncommon.

It's significant that nothing is said about what the rabbi can expect from the congregation, not only in terms of remuneration but, more important, in terms of working conditions and lay support for his efforts.

The synagogue remains the central institution of Diaspora Jewry. Unless we have realistic expectations of those who lead us and whom we view as role models, the outcome is likely to be miserable.

Unless shul members are prepared to share the responsibility for Jewish life rather than entrust it to professionals with imaginary superhuman qualities, continued erosion from within may turn out to constitute a much greater danger than the anti-Semitism from without. ■

The case for expanding Canada's sanctions against Iran

Sheryl Saperia

In a desperate attempt to reach a nuclear agreement with Iran, the Obama administration has forfeited many of its core demands. The framework announced last month in Lausanne, Switzerland, abandons UN Security Council resolutions calling for Iran to halt its enrichment activities and is ambiguous on both compliance verification and penalties for violation.

If a deal is concluded in line with the Lausanne parameters, there is broad agreement that Iran will be within arm's reach of a nuclear weapon shortly after its 10-year probation period has expired. Barring any other interdiction of Iran's weapons program, the only question remaining for the West will be the nature and assertiveness of the regime in possession of nuclear weapons capability.

Iran's recent bellicosity toward the United States – at such a critical point in the negotiations – suggests that its pursuit of regional hegemony and its support for global terror and subversion will only accelerate over the next decade. Tehran's belligerence at this sensitive time should not be viewed as mere political posturing. It's a shot across the bow signalling the regime's unwavering commitment to its Islamist ideology and its apparently correct surmise that it can behave with impunity under the protective umbrella of the emerging nuclear deal.

Put another way, Iran's nuclear ambitions cannot be viewed in isolation. France's atomic weapons do not keep security experts and neighbouring states awake at night with worry. But a regime that is committed to promoting its revolutionary and violent global agenda around the world, to sponsoring terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Hamas, to crushing "mercilessly and monumentally" pro-democracy uprisings, to torturing new inmates as a rite of passage into its prison system, to enjoying the world's highest per capita rate of executions, and to calling for the destruction of a UN member state should not be in possession of nuclear weapons.

An effective western response to Iranian aggression must, therefore, confront the regime as the multi-faceted threat it is. Indeed, human rights advocates have long urged that P5+1 negotiators with Iran adopt the approach of the United States in reaching an arms control agreement with the Soviet Union in 1975, which linked security, economic and human rights issues.

To expand that concept, nuclear sanctions relief for Iran should be tied to a requirement that the regime also cease its terrorist activity, regional aggression and subversion, explicit commitment to Israel's destruction, and vast system of domestic repression.

As a champion of Iranian human rights at the United Nations and beyond, an outspoken critic of Iran's terrorist sponsorship, and – unlike the P5+1 members – a state not deeply invested in reaching a nuclear deal no matter how poor, Canada is well positioned to take a leading role in penalizing Iran for its misconduct.

Through legislation, Ottawa could mandate that its current sanctions – imposed primarily in response to Tehran's illicit nuclear program – may not be eased unless Iran also changes its behaviour in these other critical areas of concern within a set time framework.

By targeting the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) in particular, through listing the entity as a designated person under the Special Economic Measures (Iran) Regulations and a terrorist group under the Criminal Code, Canada would go a long way to undercutting a main actor in Iranian terrorist activity, domestic repression and nuclear misbehaviour.

The legislation could also provide for ongoing reporting of Iranian wrongdoing, loosely modelling the Helsinki Monitoring Groups, which exposed human rights abuses and violations of the Helsinki Final Act.

The nuclear sanctions architecture against Iran is set to crumble, and an emboldened Tehran is emerging in its wake. Canada should step up and take the lead in containing the regime's reinvigorated appetite for aggression, and in embracing the liberal democratic forces within that country. There seems to be no shortage of those leading from far behind on this issue. Canada is well placed to fill the vacancy in front. ■

Day schools coy on new sex education curriculum

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto Jewish day schools are mostly tight-lipped when it comes to discussing Ontario's proposed sex education curriculum or their own teachings on the subject.

Many elementary schools contacted by The CJN did not return calls or emails seeking comment on the new Ontario health curriculum or what, to date, has been taught on the subject of human reproduction.

Starting next fall, Ontario's revamped sex education curriculum will see children as young as six learn about sexual consent, while eight-year-olds will be taught about same-sex relationships.

The course of instruction has met with a flurry of controversy and opposition, mainly from parents who say they don't want their children exposed to such candid sexual issues at a young age.

For example, students in Grade 1 will learn to identify body parts, including genitalia, "using correct terminology."

Other changes will see students in Grade 2 learn about stages of development and bodily changes, while same-sex relationships will be explored in Grade 3.

Students in Grade 6 will learn about masturbation and "gender expression," while kids in Grades 7 and 8 will discuss contraception, anal and oral sex, preventing pregnancy and sexually transmitted disease.

Claire Sumerlus, head of school at Robbins Hebrew Academy, told The CJN: "At this point, we are reviewing [the new curriculum]. We're just working through what we're going to do." She declined further comment.

Netivot HaTorah Day School does not teach the entire Ontario health curriculum, said Rabbi Elliott Diamond, head of Jewish studies at Netivot. "While our school strives to implement the ministry's guidelines in the areas of core curriculum, we have chosen not to implement the health curriculum in its entirety. We feel that elements of the program – specifically the sex education sections – reflect a position that is not supported by our parent body and our religious perspective," he said in a written statement.

"We feel that education toward a healthy, meaningful and religiously sanctioned attitude toward sexuality is indeed appropriate, but that these lessons are best learned when students are older. Our middle school program does address some issues of the physical and emotional developments that teenagers experience and tries to provide students with the knowledge and strategies that will serve them as they grow and develop," Rabbi Diamond said.

Eric Petersiel, head of school at Leo Baeck Day School, said the school follows Ministry of Education guidelines, including those that deal with sex education.

"We rely on province of Ontario experts to identify appropriate areas" to teach the children, he said, adding that Leo Baeck follows the current curriculum and will follow the new one as well.

The school, which is affiliated with the Reform movement, "teaches children to be proud Jews deeply engaged in the modern world. We would never choose to shy away from those elements of modern education as they are presented in the public schools," Petersiel said.

Eric Petersiel

Leo Baeck contracts with Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) to bring in social workers who address issues such as drugs and sex education at the appropriate time. Police officers address students on questions of Internet sex safety, he said.

Currently, sex ed starts in Grade 5 and is part of the physical education curriculum. One hour a week for an eight-week period is devoted to it.

"If you wait until the seventh grade to discuss the dangers of posting a sexual picture of yourself, you're way too late," he added.

Irrespective of where they stand on the issue, the controversial new sex education program appears to have little relevance for most of the community's day schools, since they, like all private schools in the province, are not obliged to follow the provincial curriculum in elementary grades.

All private schools, secular or religious, must follow the approved Ontario curriculum only if they grant high school diplomas, and there are actually separate curricula planned for the two age ranges. Elementary grades may follow the curriculum voluntarily.

Jonathan Levy, principal at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus, said his school will follow the curriculum.

"Tanenbaum CHAT teaches according to ministry guidelines. [The curriculum] will be implemented as of September. Our teachers are currently working on it."

He added: "We are an accredited high school that follows ministry curricula. We represent the broadest range of the Jewish community, a diverse range of opinion is accepted in our school as long as [it's] presented in a respectful and caring environment. As a high school we have a responsibility in this day and age to high schoolers and the issues that high school students face today."

He said TanenbaumCHAT parents have so far not expressed any concerns about the new curriculum.

"I think we need to wait and see how it rolls out and make sure as with all our courses and issues, that we address things in a caring and nurturing way."

Educators at Yeshivat Or Chaim, an Orthodox high school for boys, and Ulpanat Orot, its counterpart for girls, are still discussing the issue, said Mordechai Sabeti, director of education at Bnei Akiva Schools of Toronto.

U.S. kosher supermarket chain takes over Hartmans

plungen@thecjn.ca

The retail kosher food industry in Toronto is about to experience a shakeup.

Savours Kosher Market ULC, a U.S.-based corporation that operates kosher supermarkets under a variety of names along the Eastern Seaboard, is entering the Toronto market. Savours has acquired the assets of Hartmans Fine Kosher Foods after the longstanding Toronto shopping destination went into receivership.

Savours will continue to do business in the same locations on Bathurst Street under the name Savours Kosher Market, but with an enhanced shopping experience for the kosher consumer, said Savours founder and chair Henry Kauftheil.

In addition, Savours is leasing a vacant storefront next door to the north Bathurst location and will renovate the building to create a store modelled on its successful U.S. outlets, Kauftheil said.

That store is expected to open before Passover next year, and there are plans for yet another Savours store in the Toronto area in the near future, he said.

In the meantime, consumers can expect "a high-end experience, with fair pricing, a high level of kashrut and customer service that can't be beat," Kauftheil. "We have created an experience so that people actually love shopping [in our stores]."

The Kurtz family, which operated Hartmans for the past six years, will be involved in the new enterprise and run the Hartmans Signature meats and deli section of the store, Kauftheil said.

Kauftheil is involved in more than 10 glatt kosher supermarkets in the United States, either through Savours or with partners in other ventures. He is founder and chair of Gourmet Glatt, with two locations in New York and with stores expected to open soon in New York and New Jersey. He is founder and chair of Evergreen Kosher Market, operating in the same two states. And he holds a controlling interest in SuperFresh, an Israeli kosher "supermini-market chain" consisting of six stores, but with more expected.

"The success of our model is based on quality, choice, value and outstanding service. These are the hallmarks of a quality kosher experience which our customers enjoy," he said in a news release.

In a phone interview, Kauftheil said his "buying power" and "ability to make deals" allows his stores to offer competitive prices. His research showed Toronto, with 200,000 Jews, would present a potential venue for expansion. He learned of the Kurtz's financial difficulties and had been involved with them over the last seven or eight months.

Henry Kauftheil

He acquired the assets from the receiver, describing the situation "like a guillotine over their heads."

Savours acquired Hartmans' equipment and other assets, including the business name and goodwill, said receiver Brahm Rosen, of Rosen Goldberg Inc. "It happened relatively quickly, within one week of the appointment of a receiver," Rosen said.

The moves came after Hartmans was unable to meet the demands of its creditors. Secured creditors asked for the receiver to step in and manage the business until a new buyer could be found.

"The indebtedness was quite significant – several million dollars," said Rosen. "They have been bleeding money for some time."

Rosen operated the business for about a week to ensure it remained a going concern and "to keep the goodwill going."

In a statement, Jeffrey Kurtz said "the Kurtz family is very pleased about the transformation from Hartmans to Savours and our ongoing role in the new company. We are grateful that when Hartmans experienced financial difficulties, Mr. Kauftheil stepped in with financial assistance. The legal process of receivership allowed Savours to acquire Hartmans, which still remains responsible for its own liabilities that we are dealing with in a spirit of fairness to all concerned."

Kauftheil said he expects to create new relationships with existing vendors and is "looking very favourably at the current staff." There will be room for more personnel as the business "builds out," he said. ■

Will Challenges & Closing Arguments

Some suggest that Johnny Cochran's closing comment to the jury "If the gloves don't fit, you must acquit" distracted the jury from the strong evidence and resulted in O.J. Simpson's acquittal. Closings can sometimes be the difference between winning and losing a case.

Charles Wagner

In part, the upcoming seminar will be using the moot court to educate attendees on questions relating to the closing argument in the context of a Will Challenge. By hearing their closing arguments, attendees will learn how skillful trial lawyers artfully present their closing arguments by telling their respective clients' narrative together with an analysis of the law.

Clare Burns

The undisputed facts in this narrative are that the testator's son was living with her. The son took her mother to a lawyer in order to do a new will that disinherited the testator's daughter. The son used his power of attorney to transfer his mother's house to him. It is also undisputed that the elderly woman was illiterate and spoke only Russian and Yiddish. The lawyer met with her twice and each time spent about 15 minutes taking instructions and seeing to the execution of the will. There are some material points of law and fact in dispute. Is it legal for the daughter to challenge the will while her mother is still alive? Did the mother have capacity? Did the son unduly influence his mother? Finally, there is the issue of solicitor's negligence. Were this a real case, given the conflicting evidence and contentious points of law the importance of the closing argument is heightened. The skillful advocate uses the closing to weave the facts and law into a powerful and persuasive story. It is B'nai Brith's honour to have 2 of the premier estate litigators in the city doing the closing arguments in this moot case. Gregory M. Sidlofsky of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP is acting for the daughter and Clare Burns of WeirFoulds LLP is acting for the son.

Gregory Sidlofsky

The event will take place on June 2nd, 2015 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8. Registration is at 7:30am and the moot court will begin at 8:00am. The event is open to lawyers and accountants. Those lawyers and/or accountants interested in attending may contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca . Charles B. New group aims to solve day school tuition problem

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Huddled around a small, round table at a Thornhill coffee shop, four members of the newly formed Grassroots for Affordable Jewish Education spoke about the urgent need to help parents who can't afford Jewish education for their children.

"We want to give hope to parents and families that there are people out there who are thinking about... how they are able to send their kids to private school, and pay for a mortgage and not lose their children to another way of life. We want this discussion to get back on the agenda," said Mordechai Ben-Dat, a former editor of The CJN and current columnist who is one of six founding members of the "think-tank" established to address the issue.

"The increase in the cost of education has been reaching two and three times the rate of inflation over the past 25 years," said Rabbi Jay Kelman, an educator, accountant and CJN columnist who has written about the cost of tuition and possible solutions.

Tuition for Jewish day school in Toronto ranges from $11,000 a year in elementary school to as high as $25,000 in high school.

Jeffrey Stutz, a public policy consultant, said that in Toronto, about 30 per cent of Jewish school-age children are enrolled in day schools, but numbers are declining.

"They say our [community] tuition subsidies [from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto] are the most generous [in North America] at $10 million a year. But it's been $10 million a year for more than five years, while the costs are moving further and further out of range, so we're losing ground," Stutz said.

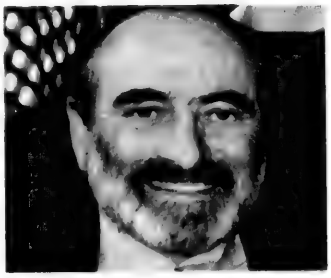
"We're also seeing that Jewish families are smaller because they're looking into the future and saying, 'How can I afford to educate three or four children?'"

Rabbi Kelman added that despite the community's affluence, affordability is still a major problem.

"We are the wealthiest generation in Jewish history, and yet we're the generation that can least afford Jewish education. There is something wrong with that."

Ben-Dat said this venture is not about pointing fingers, rather about "radically changing" the way the community approaches day school funding.

"In the last two decades, there has been a sense of shrugging the shoulders... They say, we have the existing method, we're doing the best we can, but we can't make it affordable, so people just won't go to school," Ben-Dat said.



Mordechai Ben-Dat

"We're saying we're not satisfied with that. That is not an option, and if we don't have traditional answers, we'll find non-traditional answers."

Zac Kaye, former executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said there's a sense of desperation among young middle-class families he's spoken to. "We have to think out of the box."

In the past, Rabbi Kelman has proposed that proceeds from life-insurance plans purchased by parents could go to an education fund that subsidizes tuition, but Kaye said the group will look at a range of options, including alternatives to the current day school system.

"It's not just about looking at financial implications, which is critical, but maybe can we create a no-frills school... we're looking at what's affordable," Kaye said.

"The funding is there in an untapped source, and we want to inspire all sorts of new people to find ways to tap into it, as investors, not donors," Ben-Dat said.

Daniel Held, executive director of the federation's Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education in Toronto, said he's met with the group a number of times and is committed to working with them. "The issue of day school affordability and sustainability are community issues. It is a conversation happening at every Shabbat table, in every parking lot, in every kiddush club, and it should be, because it is critical to the future of our community."

Stutz said the group will host a public forum in the fall to let interested members of the community get involved.

"This is a solvable problem," Rabbi Kelman said. "In the Jewish community, we've solved problems that were far worse."

"No option should be ruled out at this point," Stutz added.

"Except failure," Ben-Dat interjected. "We owe it to our children."

Seniors care for Canada geese on their roof

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two new residents have moved into Two Neptune Drive – Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community, but they don't pay maintenance costs.

Two Canada geese, a male and female, flew up to the ninth floor patio and created a birthing nest in the flowerbed (no flowers yet), and the female laid five eggs. The eggs were laid in a shallow depression lined with plant material and down.

"This story is both heartwarming and humorous," says resident Salya Rabow, who contacted The CJN about the visitors. "Naturally, residents have come to look and watch her. She in turn watches us and does not let anyone near."

One of the residents, Sandi Landsman, brings water and bread to the nest. The female goose has been named Morning Glory.

Resident Louise Bortenstein found the male and female on the roof garden several weeks ago. Canada geese are monogamous, and most couples stay together most of their lives.

The male goose comes every evening and leaves every morning, says Bortenstein.

Canada geese are a protected species in Canada. They are also considered a pest species, but interfering with their activities is restricted by law.

Canada geese are aggressive, and shunned for their noise and droppings as well as their hygiene. They have a tendency to attack humans when they feel that they, their eggs or their goslings are being threatened.

Mary Roseberg, 99, comes up to the patio twice a day "to sit under the sky."

She says, "Everybody is happy to see the birds and the eggs. It is a great attraction for the residents and for our socializing."

Fellow residents Monty Mazin and Nita Goldberg agree. They told The CJN that the residents all join in the excitement of having the new visitors.

They noted that local wildlife authorities have been notified and will make sure that the goslings are safe when they hatch. ■

Resident Sandi Landsman feeds the birthing female Canada goose on the patio terrace at 2 Neptune Dr. while Monty Mazin watches.

Government calls CBC report 'inaccurate and ridiculous'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The government of Canada is calling a CBC report that it is threatening to bring hate crime charges against advocates of a boycott of Israel "inaccurate and ridiculous."

The CBC, however, is standing behind its report, saying "our reporter and our editors thought it was a strong, original story."

On May 11, CBC ran an article on its website by veteran TV journalist Neil Macdonald, the network's senior Washington correspondent and its former chief Middle East correspondent based in Israel, under the headline, "Ottawa threatening hate charges against those who boycott Israel."

The article states, "The Harper government is signalling its intention to use hate crime laws against Canadian advocacy groups that encourage boycotts of Israel." It cites a number of NGOs that are concerned they might come under a hate crimes investigation, among them labour unions, student groups, the United Church of Canada and the Canadian Quakers.

"The allegation that we are using those laws in that way is completely false," said Jeremy Laurin, press secretary for Public Security Minister Steven Blaney. "The government will use its right of free speech to denounce these comments."

Meanwhile, Honest Reporting Canada is asking the CBC to review the article and take "corrective action."

Honest Reporting asks the CBC to cite a specific statement by a government minister calling for use of the hate crimes laws against boycotters.

"The article itself does not contain anything to substantiate this charge except conjecture and Mr. Macdonald's deductive reasoning, along with his forming conclusions based on some statements made by senior [Public Safety] officials," Honest Reporting stated.

The statements Honest Reporting was referring to were emails sent by Josee Sirois, a spokesperson for Public Safety Canada, who forwarded the Criminal Code's anti-hate law sections to Macdonald. The reporter had asked Sirois to clarify what Blaney meant when he said in a speech at the United Nations in January that Canada has a "zero-tolerance approach to anti-Semitism and all forms of discrimination, including in rhetoric towards Israel, and attempts to delegitimize Israel such as the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement."

In her response, reported on The Intercept website by U.S. journalist Glenn Greenwald, Sirois stated, "With regards to Canadian criminal law, I can tell you that Canada has one off the most comprehensive sets of laws against hate crime anywhere in the world."

Neil Macdonald

She goes on to cite the Criminal Code provisions against advocating genocide, promoting hate against identifiable groups, seizure of hate propaganda, provisions for enhanced sentencing for hate-motivated crimes and even refers to a section on "mischief in relation to a building that is primarily used for religious worship."

Sirois adds a reference to the federal government's Security Infrastructure Program, which helps communities protect themselves against hate-motivated crimes.

In an email response to CJN queries, Chuck Thompson, head of CBC English Service's public affairs, stated, "When Honest Reporting Canada complains about an aspect of our coverage, we respond to them directly. That organization knows how much priority CBC News places on being accountable for what we do. CBC News has a set of journalistic standards and practices which are transparent and available to the public. For times where our responses do not satisfy a complainant, we also are one of the few media organizations that has a fully independent ombudsman who can review whether CBC journalism lives up to those standards."

And in a subsequent email, Jack Nagler, director of journalistic public accountability and engagement for CBC News, responded to suggestions the item was one-sided by saying, "If this were a story on whether BDS was good or bad – or a story about Israeli policies – of course it would have required other perspectives.

"But it wasn't about either of those things. It was about trying to understand what actions the federal government intends to take, given its declaration of 'zero tolerance.'"

Honest Reporting noted that following its complaint, the headline on Macdonald's article was changed to read, "Ottawa cites hate crime laws when asked about its 'zero tolerance' for Israel boycotters." ■

Zareinu downsizes its annual Moveathon

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A prominent local Jewish organization that helps kids with disabilities is downsizing its signature annual fundraiser in response to declining attendance.

"I calculated the cost and unfortunately, it takes a lot of time," said Hershy Weinberg, the founder of Zareinu's Moveathon. "It's a 12-month-a-year plan. Also, the numbers just were not adding up. I don't have the city of Toronto supporting it – not the Orthodox, not the non-Orthodox. It's just not being supported."

Last year's proceedings followed the two-day template of recent years: a one-day festival, devoted to athletics for various skill levels, with entertainment, food, rides and games, and a second day two weeks later for more challenging bike rides.

The 18th edition dispenses with the festival and instead features four bike rides of varying distances, from 25 to 135 kilometres. Scheduled for June 7 in Richmond Hill, this year's event is called the Zareinu Bike Ride for Kids, by Moveathon. While the festival has been discontinued, participants and anyone who "comes to cheer them on" will enjoy inflatable children's rides.

As in previous years, participants are being sponsored by donors, who pledge funds to Zareinu. Weinberg hopes to raise about $500,000 from 300 riders.

As recently as five years ago, the Moveathon boasted 8,000 attendees and more than $1 million raised. But numbers have flattened since then: last year's event saw 4,000 participants and raised $600,000.

In part, the event has fallen victim to Zareinu's larger fundraising success, Weinberg said. The Moveathon and Zareinu's golf tournament once dominated the group's promotional schedule, but the group's fall fashion show has developed its own niche after 11 years. And this year's poker tournament, held in March, further crowds the calendar.

"Everybody thinks if I give to one, my responsibility has been satisfied," he said. "However, what they don't realize is that the fashion show is geared to a certain segment of the population, and not children. And the golf is focused on golfers – it's not for the children. In their mind, they gave to Zareinu. And you gave to Zareinu, yes, but what opportunity did you give to your children and grandchildren to spend the day with them?"

The Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto provides programming for children with physical and developmental challenges. At its school in the Sephardic Kehila Centre, in Thornhill, it complements classes with physical and other therapies.

Hershy Weinberg at last year's event.

Additionally, Zareinu brings off-site programs to other institutions. At an annual cost to Zareinu of $250,000, its satellite classes in day schools integrate its students in less formal activities. A newer fee-for-service model offers Zareinu therapists to deliver treatment paid for by the schools.

Several Zareinu students have overcome physical disabilities to lead next month's ride, as part of the We Can Bike program.

Organizers say the demise of the Moveathon's festival will affect the Jewish community's social fabric.

"What it really became," said Weinberg, "was more of a community gathering than just a fundraiser for Zareinu, which was really the aim of bringing achdus [unity] for the city, bringing black and white [religiously right- and left-wing Jews] together with kippah srugah [knitted kippot, common among the modern Orthodox], Orthodox and non-Orthodox. That was really the aim of it all."

Despite the community-wide support, the event skews Orthodox, although Zareinu wants to counter a false impression in the community about the organization.

"We are perceived as an Orthodox institution, and our values are based on Orthodox traditions," said Liora Sturm, Zareinu's director of events and campaigns. "Yet most of our kids are not Orthodox. The students in school come from Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and non-denominational backgrounds."

The stripped-down Moveathon returns it to its roots as a modest, one-day event, but organizers don't know if the festival component will be revived next year.

"It depends how many people miss it," said Weinberg. "If I have people that say they want to come out and support it, well, I do whatever the community wants me to do." ■

Retiring educator Stern 'took school to new heights'

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Reuven Stern

After 18 years at the helm of Thornhill's Netivot Hatorah Day School, Reuven Stern has announced that he's retiring.

Netivot will honour Stern for his years of service as the head of school with a cocktail reception on May 27 at The Avenue in Vaughan.

"He has put his heart and soul into the school, and he transformed it from the day he walked in," said Shawna Magence, past president of the school and a co-chair of the upcoming event.

"He took the school to new heights, increased enrolment and furthered the mission of the school."

He began his career in Edmonton in 1975 as a youth director, teacher and cantor at Beth Israel Synagogue.

After serving as a principal at Jewish day schools in Portland, Maine, and Indianapolis, Ind., Stern took on the role of head of school for Netivot in 1997.

Some of Stern's achievements include the expansion of the school's early childhood program to include nursery, pre-nursery and Hebrew immersion programs, as well as initiating and developing the special needs program called the Podolski-NESS department.

"We've really developed our support department, the Podolski-NESS department as it's called, and it has grown and developed wonderfully over the years. I think we've served as a model here in the city for meeting the needs of all children... as well as creating our Hebrew immersion program, in keeping with the research... that says the younger the child is exposed to a foreign language, the better," Stern said.

Stern said that when he moved to Toronto with his wife to head Netivot, his vision was to lead the school in keeping with a Zionist Orthodox ideology.

"What we wanted to do was make sure that the school would be a school of academic excellence and one that would continue teaching our children in the ways of their own parents, which is the way of modern Orthodoxy and Zionism," Stern said.

"I'm happy to have been here, as over 1,000 of our students have graduated during this time, and from what information we have, over 20 per cent have made aliyah to Israel," he said, adding that the success of his students can also be attributed to the abundance of Jewish community institutions and programs in the GTA.

Although Stern said he's looking forward to his retirement – he and his wife will be leaving Toronto and splitting their time between the United States and Israel to be with their children and grandchildren – he'll always look back fondly on his time with Netivot.

> He has put his heart and soul into [Netivot], and he transformed it

"What I'll miss most is being with the children... and, of course, the ability to work with some tremendously dedicated professionals, in both in the administration and our teaching staff. These are people who work very diligently to train the next generation of Jews and to [make sure] that Toronto has and continues to have a strong, vibrant Jewish community."

Stern said he's excited about the upcoming tribute.

"I'm so happy to take part in it and to see many of the friends and people we've interacted with – parents and teachers – over the past years come together one last time. It will be gratifying for the school and for me to be doing that."

Magence said the main purpose of the event is to give "hakarat hatov," thanks and special recognition, to Stern, but another member of the Netivot family who is retiring this year, gan (preschool) director Eileen Goldstein will also be recognized for her years of service.

"There is going to be a presentation of alumni over the last 18 years and the things that Dr. Stern has done and accomplished over his 18 years... On top of the honour, we want to leave something lasting in the school, to remember Dr. Stern... What we decided to do is raise money to create the Dr. Reuven Stern Atrium," Magence said.

"There is no man who worked harder, who was more dedicated and who modelled the life of Netivot's mission more." ■

CFLer fined for Shoah denial and other offensive tweets

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca

Montreal Alouettes player Khalif Mitchell has been fined by both the Canadian Football League and the team for posting material that denies the Holocaust, as well as other offensive content, on his Twitter account.

The team also issued an apology.

In response to a complaint from B'nai Brith Canada, the Alouettes announced May 14 that the club has fined Mitchell the maximum amount allowable under CFL rules for violating the team's social media policy. The amount of the fine wasn't disclosed.

The club "unequivocally denounce[d] the regrettable" postings made by Mitchell, which included a retweet on May 6 of a YouTube video, a "documentary" called The Greatest Lie Ever Told — The Holocaust.

The retweet was still visible on his feed on May 14, but had been removed by May 15.

Also among his recent entries are a cartoon drawing an equivalency between ISIS and Mossad, and another saying ISIS stands for "Israel's Secret Intelligence Service."

"His postings are disappointing and in no way reflect the opinions and values of the Montreal Alouettes football club," stated president and chief executive officer Mark Weightman. "His postings were completely unacceptable and the Alouettes apologize to anyone who was offended by them."

New CFL Commissioner Jeffrey Orridge also condemned the postings.

"While we acknowledge that players have a right to hold and express their own opinions, in no circumstance do we condone activity or comments that are derogatory or inappropriate, putting the league's reputation in question, and we feel Mr. Mitchell's recent behaviour on social media has violated these principles," Orridge said.

Mitchell, a defensive tackle who signed a three-year contract with the club in February, posts as @TruthWillFree96. He has more than 2,000 followers.

In comments to the National Post, Mitchell said, "I believe the Holocaust happened. I believe that people died in the Holocaust. I believe that the Holocaust is an example of pure hatred, in its purest sense, on this earth that we even know of, and that we should look into it and examine it for its authenticity, to understand how much hate could have been amassed on one people."

He said curiosity led him to the 77-minute online video, which claims the number of Jews murdered in the camps is too high to be credible, among other doubts about the magnitude of the Holocaust.

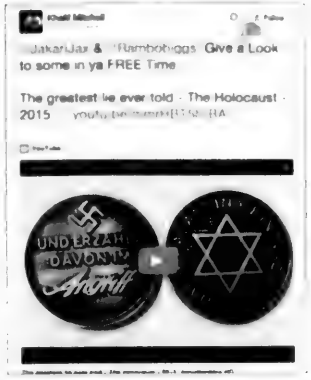

Image from Khalif Mitchell's Twitter account.

On May 14, B'nai Brith denounced Mitchell's postings in a press release after it had not received any response to letters a few days earlier to Alouettes general manager Jim Popp and Orridge.

B'nai Brith spokesperson Sam Eskenasi said Mitchell's Twitter feed has many "bizarre and weird" postings. There have also been "outlandish conspiracy theories [and] comparisons of police officers to the Ku Klux Klan," he said.

"As an all-star and role model for Canadian youth, Mr. Mitchell should not be sending out divisive and hateful tweets under the banner of the Montreal Alouettes organization," said B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn.

In 2012, when he was playing for the B.C. Lions, the CFL fined Mitchell an undisclosed amount for using a derogatory term for Chinese people in a tweet. The 30-year-old Virginia Beach, Va., native has also played for the Toronto Argonauts.

Mitchell told the Montreal Gazette in February when he signed with the Alouettes, in reference to the 2012 tweet and other misbehaviour: "I'm not who I was, I'm who I am. I'm a man now. When I was done doing those things [I was] a child. I was coming up at 23, 24, 25, having no male influence."

B'nai Brith faults the Alouettes for not being more vigilant about Mitchell's social media activity, given his past.

"While understanding that we cannot judge the stream of consciousness of individuals who share offbeat Internet postings," Mostyn said, "these repugnant tweets are shameful not just to Mr. Mitchell, but the entire Alouettes organization." ■

A Shavuot renaissance

RABBI DONNIEL HARTMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Israelis celebrate Shavuot more than any other Jewish community in the world. On Erev Shavuot, religious, secular and traditional Jews from all over the country will join in the tens of thousands to study in various and incredibly diverse programs of Tikkun Leil Shavuot. What was once the inheritance of primarily the Orthodox has now become the inheritance of many.

The renaissance of Shavuot has not been accompanied by increased ritual observance. As distinct from Pesach and Sukkot, Shavuot concentrates on the act of studying Torah. It symbolizes the idea that we Jews are a people of the Book, and that to be a Jew means to be involved in study and thought. Talmud Torah, for some, is important for it can lead to practice.

This is not its meaning in modern Israel, nor do I believe, even amongst the rabbis. When the rabbis declare: "The study of Torah surpasses them all," (Mishnah Peah 1:1), they are not referring to the study required to perfect the practice of Jewish ritual, for that which is needed in order to attain this goal is marginal.

Torah study is significant not merely because it enables practice, but rather because it redefines the focus of Judaism's religious agenda away from observance alone and toward a world of thought and ideas, as well. To celebrate Shavuot is to declare that in our religious tradition, what we think, how we think, and what ideas we produce are critical to the quality and nature of our Jewish identities and lives.

As we celebrate Shavuot this year, we find ourselves in a particularly precarious position, for we are increasingly becoming a people in which the ethos of Torah study – that is, to believe that ideas are important – is being seriously threatened. We have become a people motivated and guided by crises, from Ahmadinejad and Iranian missiles, to Jewish continuity, to Madoff. These crises are treated like fires that must be extinguished. These efforts, however, are quenching much of our creativity.

We have flattened our intellectual horizons and transformed serious issues in need of serious new thinking into shallow debates, the bantering slogans, and short-term solutions. "United Jerusalem," a "two-state solution," "Peace Now," Israel as a "Jewish Democratic State," "Jewish continuity," have all become slogans bantered about instead of issues that require our deepest and most creative thoughts.

How we build a Jewish and democratic state with a large Palestinian Arab minority is not an issue to be manipulated for public political points, but one which intellectually and morally we must struggle with. The future of the West Bank and the settlements has been transformed into a question of what U.S. President Barack Obama wants and will let us get away with and not what we want to be in the future. Israel and Jewish morality of war has become an issue debated along political lines, as if it is only a political and not a moral issue.

In the name of Jewish continuity, we are engaging in endless studies to learn exactly the Jewish sensibilities, or lack thereof, of our youth. Yet we are rarely using this knowledge to develop a vision of where they ought to be and how we can inspire them to get there, but rather to chase after them in panic under the vague notion that if we reach them wherever they are, they may somehow want to "continue" to be Jews. We have transformed our public discourse into one of slogans instead of substance.

Shavuot and the commandment of talmud Torah teach that there is no continuity without content, and that the survival of the Jewish People, while dependent upon the marshalling of military and political force where necessary, cannot be sustained through these efforts alone.

In a world where all Jews are Jews by choice, we will be sustained only to the extent that we field a product worthy of perpetuation, and a religion filled with ideas and values that inspire commitment and give meaning to belonging.

As we celebrate Shavuot, we need more than a Tikkun Leil Shavuot. We need a tikkun for our people. We need to recommit to being a people of great ideas. It was these ideas that constituted the revolution that was and is Judaism and that inspired us over the centuries. We need to keep continuing to inspire ourselves if we are to do justice to our heritage and create the foundations for our future. ■

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two new residents have moved into Two Neptune Drive – Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community, but they don't pay maintenance costs.

Two Canada geese, a male and female, flew up to the ninth floor patio and created a birthing nest in the flowerbed (no flowers yet), and the female laid five eggs. The eggs were laid in a shallow depression lined with plant material and down.

"This story is both heartwarming and humorous," says resident Salya Rabow, who contacted The CJN about the visitors. "Naturally, residents have come to look and watch her. She in turn watches us and does not let anyone near."

One of the residents, Sandi Landsman, brings water and bread to the nest. The female goose has been named Morning Glory.

Resident Louise Bortenstein found the male and female on the roof garden several weeks ago. Canada geese are monogamous, and most couples stay together most of their lives.

The male goose comes every evening and leaves every morning, says Bortenstein.

Canada geese are a protected species in Canada. They are also considered a pest species, but interfering with their activities is restricted by law.

Canada geese are aggressive, and shunned for their noise and droppings as well as their hygiene. They have a tendency to attack humans when they feel that they, their eggs or their goslings are being threatened.

Mary Rosenberg, 99, comes up to the patio twice a day "to sit under the sky."

She says, "Everybody is happy to see the birds and the eggs. It is a great attraction for the residents and for our socializing."

Fellow residents Monty Mazin and Nita Goldberg agree. They told The CJN that the residents all join in the excitement of having the new visitors.

They noted that local wildlife authorities have been notified and will make sure that the goslings are safe when they hatch. ■

Resident Sandi Landsman feeds the birthing female Canada goose on the patio terrace at 2 Neptune Dr. while Monty Mazin watches.

Terror survivor to lecture on human rights

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Kay Wilson, a survivor of a terror attack in Israel, will be the guest speaker at the second annual StandWithUs Canada Campus Champions Dinner to be held on June 1 at a private home.

"Kay travels around the world for us as a motivational speaker on issues of human rights, and on justice for victims of terrorism. She will be speaking about tolerance and seeking peace for those who were murdered because they were Jewish, Israeli, or just cared about Israel," said Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada.

StandWithUs, a 13-year-old non-profit organization headquartered in Los Angeles with chapters around the world, is dedicated to informing the public about Israel through fact-based materials, speakers, advocacy and leadership education.

Wilson, who is coming to Canada for the first time, is a 50-year-old British-born Israeli tour guide, jazz musician, and cartoonist. She spoke to The CJN from her home in Israel's Negev Desert.

On Dec. 18, 2010, she said, she was on a hike on the Israel National Trail with American friend Kristine Luken when she saw two Palestinians crouched in the bushes.

Michael Dickson, director of the StandWithUs Israel Education Center, with Kay Wilson

"I was concerned. I had hoped they didn't see us, but they did. They asked for water in Hebrew. I responded in Hebrew, and they went away. I told Kristine, who is a Christian, not to panic and that we should get back to the car. I then took out a very small penknife from my backpack.

"We were walking through the forest trail, and behind me I heard Kristine scream. That's when one of them jumped on me. I stabbed him with my knife and managed to knick him in the leg. It was the DNA of their blood on my penknife that enabled the police to catch the terrorist. It also linked them to the unsolved murder of an Israeli woman, Netta Blatt-Sorek. According to their own confession, their motive was to 'kill Jews,'" she said.

"I didn't understand. They didn't rape us and they weren't particularly interested in stealing anything. I was trying to pretend I was a tourist, but he discovered my Israeli ID and he saw my Star of David. I started conversing with him in Hebrew but in vain. After half an hour of eternity, they separated us by a couple of metres. I was pushed onto my knees, my head was pushed forward. I understood I was going to be beheaded and they started stabbing and grinding the machete into my bones. The only hope I had was to play dead, which was incredibly difficult," Wilson said.

She said she watched in horror as Luken was butchered to death.

"They left, but within a few seconds they came back and one of them rolled me onto my back. I watched him plunge the machete into my chest. I still didn't move. I had my eyes open. The machete missed my heart by four millimetres."

When the men left, Wilson staggered, bound and gagged, through the forest for more than a kilometre until she found help.

"Through the valley of death, I started to compose a piano arrangement to Somewhere Over the Rainbow. I used it to distract myself from thinking of my friend. Thinking I am going to be dead in a couple of minutes while also thinking about D Flat Major – absolutely insane."

"I sustained 13 stab wounds in my lungs and diaphragm, and six open-compound fractures of my ribs. Many ribs had also splintered into my lungs, and I had a dislocated shoulder, a crushed sternum and a broken shoulder blade. I don't know how I survived. No one is more surprised than I am that I am alive.

"I tell the story because in Jewish thought we are told to bear witness, and I need to bear witness to what humanity is capable of, and to the life and death of my friend. Choosing life, love, and laughter over death, hatred, and sadness, are the tools that help me deal with my experience," Wilson said.

Wilson will also be speaking at StandWithUs Canada's community-wide event at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on June 2. ■

Alan Borovoy remembered for his passionate defence of free speech

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Alan Borovoy, longtime head of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA) and one of Canada's fiercest but most gentlemanly defenders of the principle of free speech died on May 11 of heart failure. He was 83.

Borovoy was remembered as an accomplished author, a lover of the Yiddish language, and often a lone voice in speaking up for principles he held dear.

He served as general counsel of the CCLA from May 1968 until June 2009. He was inducted into the Order of Canada in 1982.

Borovoy was a member of the community relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress from 1951 until Congress' demise in 2011, and before that, served as a youth delegate to the Jewish labour committee, which was one of Congress' constituent groups, said Bernie Farber a friend of Borovoy's since 1984.

Farber, who often sparred with Borovoy on issues of free speech, recalled Borovoy as "a man of great passion, a possessor of a rapier wit" and "a gentleman of the old world."

He was an advocate of civil rights from an early age.

"He grew up in the streets of Toronto as a minority, a Jewish kid in 1930s and '40s Toronto where anti-Semitism was rife and seen quite often.

"He saw what it was like to be a minority and saw that without civil rights protection, minorities were vulnerable," Farber said.

Those early experiences profoundly affected his public life. "He understood the need for civil rights protection" and was one of the architects of Ontario's Human Rights Code, which legislated equal delivery of services and accommodations without discrimination, Farber said.

A passionate advocate for free speech, Borovoy often found himself disagreeing with others on Congress' community relations committee, sometimes as a minority of one.

In the mid-1980s, disgraced Alberta school teacher Jim Keegstra and Toronto neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel were being prosecuted under Canada's anti-hate law and "false news" law, respectively.

Borovoy opposed the prosecutions, arguing that the laws violated principles of free speech. His line, repeated often in debates and in public forums was that "we should let them wallow in the obscurity that they so richly deserve," Farber recounted.

Farber, who had lunch with Borovoy monthly until his death, said many in the Jewish community confused Borovoy's opposition to prosecution with support for Keegstra and Zundel themselves.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Borovoy reviled them and what they stood for. But his position put him at odds with many Holocaust survivors, and "he felt he upset survivors. That upset him terribly. I don't think he ever got over it," Farber said.

In more recent years, he applauded the revocation of Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which had legislated against online hate.

"He felt it was an unneeded and unnecessary piece of legislation," Farber said. "He never lost his passion for the absolutism of free speech."

Borovoy wrote several books, including When Freedoms Collide: The Case for Our Civil Liberties. His most recent work was At the Barricades, which was released in 2014.

In At the Barricades, he described himself as "a social democrat, a civil libertarian, a secular Jew, and a philosophical pragmatist… a small-l liberal… [and] an unequivocal anti-Communist and perhaps even a Cold War hawk."

In a 2014 interview in the Ottawa Citizen, Borovoy was critical of the Stephen Harper government's tough on crime approach.

But he applauded its support for Israel and the prime minister's visit there.

"In Harper's recent visit to Israel, he was paying special respect to a political democracy in that part of the world, in the Middle East. I do appreciate his attachment of a special value to Israel, because Israel is a democracy, a beleaguered democracy," Borovoy is quoted as saying

Over the years, he worked with the national committee for human rights of the Canadian Labour Congress, the Ontario Labour Committee for Human Rights, and the Toronto and District Labour Committee for Human Rights

In 1963, he ran for the NDP in the provincial riding of Downsview, finishing second.

Known for his sense of humour, "Alan was also a great Yiddishist," Farber said. "He loved to speak Yiddish. Until recently, he would meet four or five guys for lunch and to speak Yiddish."

In a news release, Sukanya Pillay, CCLA executive director and general counsel, said, "We are deeply saddened by the profound loss of our dear friend and former leader.

"For over 40 years, he made countless contributions to civil liberties in Canada. We will never forget him. We will strive to honour his life's work by continuing to fight for fundamental freedoms and human rights. We will greatly miss him – his brilliance, his generosity, his irreverent humour and the passion and dedication to equality that was his life's work. Canada and the CCLA owe Alan Borovoy an immense debt."

"It is with deep sadness that we learned of the death of Alan Borovoy," said David Cape, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). "His understanding of human rights issues and the need to be vigilant in the protection of our fundamental freedoms was unparalleled. Whether you agreed with him or disagreed with him, it was impossible to not respect him.

"Everyone who had the privilege of working with Alan had the opportunity to appreciate his passion, dignity, sense of humour and humility. Today we mourn the loss of a great Canadian, a good man and a mensch. May his memory be for a blessing." ■

A 'radical' in our midst

Franklin Bialystok

The passing of Alan Borovoy on May 11 marks the end of an era in Canadian Jewish life, when "radicals" stood for human rights with relentless energy while maintaining a balance between shielding minorities from discrimination and hatred in speech and in the press, and protecting freedom of expression.

Borovoy grew up in the Depression and World War II, when systemic anti-Semitism, racism and the legal curtailment of elementary freedoms in Canada were the norm. In an era of "none is too many," the internment of Japanese Canadians, the Chinese Immigration Act, and the discrimination against African-Canadians in employment, housing, and access to public services, Borovoy's upbringing in a liberal Jewish home spurred his conviction to strive for social justice.

He was a 19-year-old student in 1951 at the University of Toronto when he joined the joint public relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress as a student delegate from Hillel. The committee had been established in 1938 with representatives from Congress and B'nai Brith Canada to counter anti-Semitism and support other minorities against discrimination.

In 1962, it changed the "public" in its name to "community," and after B'nai Brith's establishment of the League for Human Rights in the 1970s, it became the community relations committee (CRC). Borovoy was a stalwart member, ever involved in Congress advocacy, until the demise of the CJC in 2011. His tenure of 60 years as a volunteer in a Jewish advocacy organization is undoubtedly unique.

In the 1950s, Congress, together with the Jewish Labour Committee and the Association for Civil Liberties, advocated for legislation to enact racial equity, leading to the passage of the Fair Employment Practices Act in 1951 and the Fair Accommodations Act of 1954.

In the 1960s, Canadian Jews were defamed by neo-Nazi groups. In response, Congress pressed for legislation against hate speech. Within the CRC, a coterie of civil libertarians, urged restraint. They argued that this might lead to the incarceration of individuals professing opinions that may be deemed outside the public interest. Borovoy was joined by Syd Midanik, a previous chair of the committee, and David Satok, a future chair, in challenging the consensus. Notwithstanding their opposition, lobbying from the CJC led to the establishment of the Cohen Commission on Hate Speech, which included future prime minister Pierre Trudeau and resulted in the inclusion of hate speech provisions in the Criminal Code in 1970.

> He revelled in debate, often taking a position that seemed contrary to his basic beliefs

Borovoy further inflamed mainstream Jews in the 1980s with his opposition to the charges against Ernst Zundel, the profligate disseminator of Holocaust denial literature, for spreading "false news," and against Jim Keegstra, a vitriolic anti-Semitic Alberta teacher, for contravening the Criminal Code's hate provisions.

As much as Borovoy detested these men, he argued that it was impossible to determine whether they knowingly comprehended that their views were false, and that Keegstra should be summarily fired, rather than tried as a criminal.

As the "radicals" passed away, Borovoy became an often lonely voice of dissent on the committee. He was a gadfly, arguing against public support of Jewish schools, supporting the removal of prayer from public education and excoriating extremist Jewish attacks in Israel. His views were expressed with humour, often in Yiddish and free of accusatory language. He revelled in the debate, often taking a position that seemed to be contrary to his basic beliefs, but when articulated, revealed a cogent perspective. Without dominating the discussion, Borovoy was adept at articulating a position concisely and without rancour.

In an interview with Barbara Frum on CBC's Weekday in 1970, he stated that he "wanted to move establishments that were otherwise resistant [to change]," by creating a "social consensus [that was] more responsive to the little people."

In his 2013 autobiography, At the Barricades, Borovoy wrote that he "eschewed both transcendent absolutism and subjective relativism" and that his approach was "pragmatic… [abhorred] doctrinaire thinking… [and held] that a plurality of values and truths had to be perpetually balanced."

If being radical meant protecting human rights in a democratic society, Alan Borovoy was an exemplar of Jewish tradition. ■

Canadiens still have a prayer thanks to local Chabad rabbi

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath converses over Skype with Rabbi Mendy Dubrowski in Tampa, Fla.

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca MONTREAL

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath, director of Chabad NDG in Montreal, "reluctantly" kept his word and donned a Tampa Bay Lightning jersey to deliver his Shabbat sermon this past weekend after losing a "spiritual wager" with a colleague in Florida.

The friendly bet began when the Montreal Canadiens, of which Rabbi Bernath is a devout fan, were down two games to none in the Stanley Cup semifinals.

Prayer seemed to be the only answer – that and social media. He posted his wishes of "good spiritual vibes" to the Habs on his Facebook page.

Friend Rabbi Mendy Dubrowski of Chabad of South Tampa responded on his wall that such good vibrations should not be wasted.

They set up a Skype meeting to discuss the issue further. With a phone video camera rolling, the rabbis commiserated just before the third match. Rabbi Dubrowski is a faithful Lightning fan and is friendly with the team's owner, Jeffrey Vinik, who is Jewish.

Both wearing their team's jersey, they tossed around ideas. They agreed that when the odds were against them, Jews have always turned to prayer.

But which prayer? Rabbi Bernath suggested the Shema because it is the fundamental prayer expressing belief in God.

They then decided to encourage as many of the teams' respective Jewish followers to perform a mitzvah and upload a video of themselves reciting the prayer and post it on Facebook or Twitter at #HabsShema or #BoltsShema, and tag their friends. And it was "game on!"

Perhaps to his regret today, Rabbi Bernath went a step further and suggested a personal wager between the two of them about wearing the opposing team's jersey.

"Sometimes I get these crazy ideas," admitted Rabbi Bernath, who also created the "Quebec kippah" at the height of the values charter debate.

Rabbi Dubrowski readily agreed, confidently offering to send his own jersey up to Montreal to collect his bet.

The 2-1/2-minute video went viral on YouTube and Facebook and, if it is any consolation, the Montreal rabbi won in the Shema contest.

More than 300 Canadiens fans prayed for a miracle, while only 50-60 Lightning supporters did likewise, said Rabbi Bernath. The Chicago native admits he was not into hockey before he came to Montreal 10 years ago.

But in a city where hockey is often referred to as a religion, he soon caught the spirit, no pun intended.

He also was friendly with former Canadiens defenceman Hal Gill, when he lived in NDG near the Chabad centre.

Those collective pleas to God might have helped the Habs pull from behind and win at least two games, ending the series 4-2.

In a more serious vein, Rabbi Bernath said the project reached many people who otherwise are not strongly connected to Judaism. The video received over 2,800 views.

"I got so many amazing messages," said Rabbi Bernath. He reads one he found especially touching from a young father. He writes on Facebook that he did not even know what the Shema was until he saw the rabbis' video.

"My wife and I have now decided that we will make the prayer part of our children's bedtime routine."

Rabbi Bernath said that is not unusual. "A lot of young Jews don't know this seminal prayer. I think as a rabbi I have to make Judaism current, and show that it has meaning in every part of our lives."

Hockey fandom is filled with all kinds of superstition and casual talk about praying for a team's success, Rabbi Bernath said. His goal is to make Jewish fans aware that their tradition provides them with a way of connecting to their spiritual side. ■

Don't dilute anti-Semitism, Canadian minister says

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

Canada's minister of state for multiculturalism believes grouping anti-Semitism with other forms of racism and hate crime waters it down.

"Anti-Semitism itself is the oldest form of hatred. It has resulted in the Holocaust... the killings of millions of people," Tim Uppal said.

"I consider myself a very visible minority," said Uppal, who is Sikh and wears a turban. "To me, racism is real, it's something we do have to address, but I think on anti-Semitism, the level of misinformation, the level of hatred – it goes much deeper than just the average racism."

Uppal was in Israel for the fifth Global Forum for Combating Antisemitism, May 12 to 14.

"There's always discussion of 'let's broaden it,' but I think that dilutes it," Uppal told The CJN.

At the forum's opening event, "the representative from the United Nations, whenever he said 'anti-Semitism,' he said we [also] have to deal with... Islamophobia, and racism of all kinds. He kept doing it. That's... part of the problem with the UN. They're diluting themselves so much they're not going to end up solving anything.

"Anti-Semitism is unique," Uppal said. "On the Internet, in a day... there are 100,000 expressions of hatred. Of those, 80 per cent are anti-Semitic. This is a unique problem that requires unique solutions."

It is a growing problem everywhere, including back at home. "We are seeing a rise in incidents of anti-Semitism around the world, but disturbingly enough, we're seeing this in Canada as well."

Tim Uppal at the fifth Global Forum for Combating Antisemitism in Israel.

Not all anti-Semitic incidents are reported, he believes. "When someone gets hurt, you'd hope they'd go to the police, but I'm sure there are other times – whether it's vandalism that they've been able to clean up themselves, or verbal exchanges – that don't get reported."

Uppal, who has championed Jewish causes since he was elected in 2008, said that when he was growing up in Alberta, "Jews weren't even on the radar... It's very possible I had Jewish friends, but as a kid, I never knew it."

In 2010, given the opportunity to introduce a private member's bill, Uppal noted that Canada was the only Allied nation without a national Holocaust memorial. The National Holocaust Memorial Act passed unanimously, and the memorial will begin construction in Ottawa this year.

"I've been the victim of racism, but [with other types of racism], you do not see the same level of building up of a scenario which is absolutely, completely false. They showed an article today [at the forum] where Jews will kill puppies for the blood... to put into matzah.

"It's unbelievable. This building up of misinformation to create anti-Semitism is quite deliberate and thought-out... You don't see that in any other types of racism."

Uppal said this is also true of the BDS [boycott, divestment and sanctions] movement against Israel. "I had the opportunity to sit down with the CEO of Sodastream... Here's a company, the largest non-government employer of Palestinians, but because of the BDS movement, they have essentially had to lay them off and pull out."

On a previous trip to Israel, in June 2014, Uppal ascended the Temple Mount just months after Prime Minister Stephen Harper declined to do so, citing security reasons. "I really felt the significance of what a holy place this is," he said at the time, calling Muslim restrictions on Jewish prayer there "unjustifiable."

Hosted by the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the three-day forum also hosted filmmaker Edward James Olmos at an event titled "We are One: Humanity Must Stand United Against Antisemitism." Sen. Linda Frum also attended the forum.

Forum events focused on online anti-Semitism, with representatives from Google, Facebook and other private companies meeting with government leaders and academics to discuss policy. Dealing with anti-Semitism as a separate category is a key step that many are reluctant to take.

But "governments that get it can be more successful," Uppal said. ■

Israel at centre of international diplomatic storm

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

The Palestinian decision to internationalize their conflict with Israel seems to be paying off as Israel is coming under diplomatic pressure on several fronts at the same time.

The Vatican decision to recognize "Palestine" as a state, an expected French-sponsored resolution to the United Nations Security Council, and the possible expulsion of Israel from FIFA, the international soccer federation, are creating the sense that Israel is losing the diplomatic battle.

"There is a sense of erosion," a senior Israeli official told The Media Line on condition of anonymity. "We see more and more countries and organizations buying into the unilateral logic of the Palestinians."

But he warned, ultimately it will not be possible to create a Palestinian state without Israeli approval.

"No matter how much the Palestinians obtain in declarations and international organizations it can't replace negotiations," he said. "Palestinians have given up on negotiations and we believe it's a huge mistake."

The latest decision by the Vatican to sign a treaty with the "state of Palestine", concerning the Holy See's activities in the Palestinian Authority, came before a weekend meeting between the Pope and the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas. It is an important symbolic move by the leader of the world's 1.2 billion Catholics. At the UN, the Vatican and Palestine are both considered non-member observer states.

OPINION

Longing for 'America!'

Sagi Melamed

I was first introduced to the "America!" brand as a kindergartener on Kibbutz Ramat Yochanan, thanks to Elazar "Luzer" Halivni, whose ceramics studio was located at the junction of the main road to the kibbutz and the path to the swimming pool.

One-eyed and misanthropic, Luzer avoided company, but he loved children's laughter. When we ran to the pool, he would come out with a garden hose and spray us with cold water as we laughed and shouted, "America! America!" Refreshing water streaming over me on a steamy day was the first "America!" I knew.

For us, America represented all that was good and successful. American products were high quality. In American movies, the hero always won. America was always on the side of justice. I personally put the theory of "American quality" into practice: I married an American woman and received an American education.

But in recent years, America no longer looks like the "America!" of my childhood.

"It used to be us," lamented journalist Thomas Friedman, writing about the loss of American leadership in innovation to new global players. I am less concerned with America's decline in leadership in innovation than by its decline in leadership in global welfare and justice. America has climbed down from the watchtower of the world, but a class needs its teacher, an army unit its commander, a business its CEO. States need governments and the world needs a leader. International relations, like nature, abhors a vacuum – when the good retreats, the bad advances. A world without a strong America that recognizes its global responsibilities and shoulders them is a world that is less safe.

Israel also needs a strong, supportive America, whereas America does not need Israel. But need is one thing, obligation another. Even Israelis who excel at self-criticism concede that Israel is America's little sister, in terms of shared values and worldview, whereas the other countries in our neighbourhood are not even distant cousins. They may be treaty partners, but they are certainly not family. We only have to look back a very few years to the "Arab Spring" to see that the promise of democracy, human rights, women's rights and enlightenment, dissipated like clouds in the hot Middle Eastern sky, causing inestimable damage.

From Thomas Friedman's interview of President Barack Obama on April 5, in which Obama presented his Iran doctrine, we can draw three conclusions:

First, that Obama may truly believe that Iran will keep its side of the agreement to limit its nuclear power, but anyone who has ever traded with Iranians will argue the opposite.

Second, that although some see Obama as anti-Israel, I believe Obama sees himself as our friend. But a friendship is not family. If the relationship were less "friends" and more "family," the lack of chemistry between the two countries could be overcome. Friends change, family is forever.

And last, that ironically, the asset of liberal, modern, intellectual values that Obama brought to the White House has become, in foreign relations, a liability. This is particularly true in its attitude to Israel.

I recently discussed the following question with my friend L., a leader of the Canadian Jewish community: What would it take for American public concern to return to the issues of existence, national identity, cohesion and willingness to sacrifice? Would it take (God forbid a million times) another, even more cruel, 9/11-style attack to turn American attention from the cost of gas, the job market and the Dow Jones, back to the values that made it the "America!" we all admired and wanted to emulate: the America of the Declaration of Independence, the Wild West, the moon landing, the defeat of the Nazis; America the proud, feeling itself obliged and willing to work hard and even risk the lives of its citizens and soldiers, in its role as the leader of the free world?

Does America, somewhat like its little sister in the Middle East (which is united mainly when under attack), need a scourge to make it "America!"? ■

Vatican recognition of PA is important, analysts say

In a statement, PLO Executive Committee member Hanan Ashrawi welcomed the decision.

"The significance of this decision goes beyond the political and legal into the symbolic and moral domains and sends a message to all people of conscience that the Palestinian people deserve the right to self-determination, formal recognition, freedom, and statehood," she said in a statement.

Some Israeli analysts said the move by the Vatican, while purely symbolic, was nevertheless important.

"It's a big deal because the Pope is the spiritual leader of hundreds of millions of Christians," Eytan Gilboa of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar Ilan University said. "Christians are being murdered all over the Middle East but what is important for him is the particular recognition of Palestine."

But others said that Israel should be more concerned about its relationship with the U.S., than with the Vatican.

"This has basically been Vatican policy all along," Amiel Ungar, an Israeli commentator said. "The big enchilada is how much the Obama administration is behind the European moves."

Pope Francis with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, right, and then-Israeli president Shimon Peres in the Vatican gardens in June, 2014. The Vatican recently recognized "Palestine" as a state. HAIM ZACH/GPO/FLASH90

France is expected to soon present a new resolution to the UN Security Council to recognize Palestine. In the past, the U.S. vetoed all such resolutions, but after the election of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said it will "reassess" that decision.

The guidelines of Netanyahu's new government does not include any mention of a Palestinian state, a change from the previous government. A group of former European leaders and diplomats has called for more pressure on Israel, and charges that EU political and financial aid has achieved nothing but the "preservation of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and imprisonment of Gaza."

At the same time, the Palestinians have been campaigning in FIFA, the international soccer federation, to suspend Israel's membership or to level sanctions on Israel for limiting the free movement of Palestinian soccer players and refusing them permission to travel abroad. The 200 national leagues in FIFA are expected to vote on the resolution in the coming weeks.

All of this is expected to lead to growing international pressure on Israel, but it could also end up backfiring and encouraging Palestinians to stay away from the negotiating table.

"Israel has only three cards it can use with the Palestinians – giving up territory, international recognition, and the release of Palestinian prisoners," Eytan Gilboa said. "But if they get the recognition without any negotiations, what motivation do they have to negotiate with Israel?" ■

Who's who in Israel's 34th government

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu (Likud) is beginning his third consecutive term (fourth overall) as the country's leader. Netanyahu also currently holds the foreign affairs and communications portfolios.

Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon (Likud) will continue to lead Israel's defense establishment as he has done since 2013.

Finance Minister Moshe Kahlon (Kulanu) took a break from politics in 2012 before forming his own party in the election, running on a socio-economic platform.

Education Minister Naftali Bennett (Jewish Home) served as Netanyahu's chief of staff in 2006 before quitting the job and winning the leadership of Jewish Home in 2012.

Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked (Jewish Home) is a first-time minister who has been a member of Knesset since 2013. A secular woman from Tel Aviv, she stands out from the party's largely religious base.

Transportation and Intelligence Minister Yisrael Katz (Likud) has been in the Knesset since 1998. He has served as transportation minister since 2009.

Interior Minister Silvan Shalom (Likud) has been a member of Knesset for 23 years and served as finance minister and foreign minister in the governments of Ariel Sharon.

Deputy Health Minister Yaakov Litzman (United Torah Judaism) will be the de facto health minister, a position he held between 2009 and 2013.

Construction and Housing Minister Yoav Galant (Kulanu) was head of the IDF Southern Command between 2005-2010.

Culture and Sports Minister Miri Regev (Likud) is a first-time minister who has seen a meteoric rise through the ranks of Likud.

Economy Minister and Minister for the Development of the Negev and the Galilee, Aryeh Deri (Shas) served as interior minister from 1988-1993. In 1999 he was convicted of accepting bribes, fraud and breach of trust and served two years in prison.

Energy and Infrastructures Minister Yuval Steinitz (Likud) has been in the Knesset since 1999. He has served as finance minister and intelligence minister.

Absorption Minister and Strategic Affairs Minister Ze'ev Elkin (Likud) immigrated from Ukraine in 1990 and was first elected to the Knesset in 2006.

Science and Technology Minister Danny Danon (Likud) entered the Knesset in 2009.

Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel (Jewish Home) served as construction and housing minister in the previous government.

Environmental Protection Minister Avi Gabai (Kulanu) is not a member of the Knesset. He helped Kahlon form Kulanu.

Minister of Gender Equality, Minorities and Senior Citizens Gila Gamliel (Likud) has served in the Knesset since 2003.

Religious Affairs Minister David Azoulay (Shas) has been a member of Knesset since 1996.

Minister without portfolio Benny Begin (Likud) has served in the past as science minister as well as a member of Netanyahu's security cabinet. He is the son of prime minister Menachem Begin.

Education Minister Naftali Bennett

Welfare Minister Haim Katz (Likud) is also the head of the Israel Aerospace Industries Workers Union. He has served in the Knesset on and off since 1999.

Public Security Minister and Tourism Minister Yariv Levin (Likud) has been in the Knesset since 2009.

Minister without portfolio Ofir Akunis (Likud), a longtime ally of the prime minister and former Netanyahu spokesman.

Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovely (Likud) will be the foreign minister until Netanyahu hands the post to a new coalition partner. Netanyahu is the serving foreign minister, but Hotovely will manage the day-to-day work and make major decisions affecting Israel's diplomatic corps. ■

Israeli krav maga is more than a self-defence system

plungen@thecjn.ca

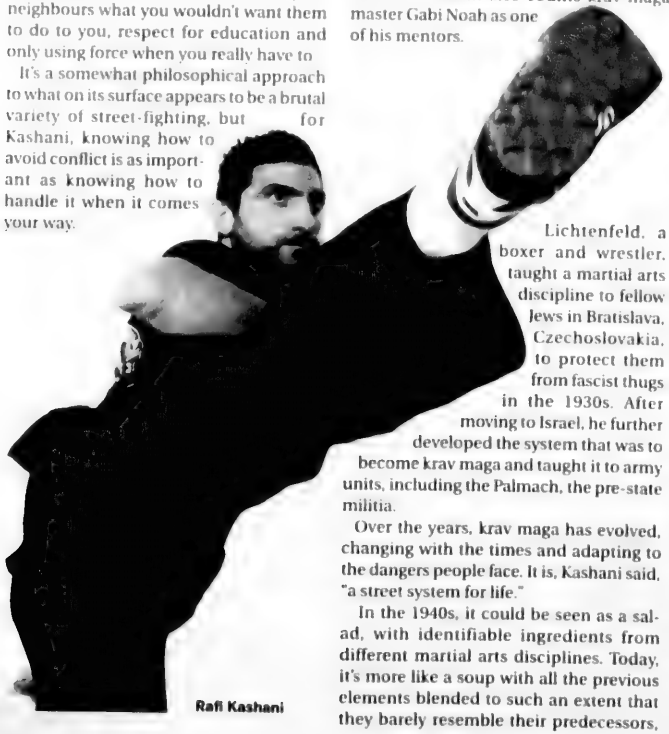
Krav maga translates from the Hebrew as "contact fighting," more or less, but at its heart, the Israeli combat system tries to avoid conflict.

In fact, explains Rafi Kashani, if you examine it closely, krav maga embodies some fundamental Jewish values, including preserving life, not doing to your neighbours what you wouldn't want them to do to you, respect for education and only using force when you really have to.

It's a somewhat philosophical approach to what on its surface appears to be a brutal variety of street-fighting, but for Kashani, knowing how to avoid conflict is as important as knowing how to handle it when it comes your way.

"We do everything not to get hurt, and we use the knowledge only to use force when it's necessary," he said.

Kashani is founder of IKM Krav Maga Canada – Academy of Self Defence, as well as its main instructor. Now 33, he's been perfecting his skills at the sport since he was a 10-year-old living in central Tel Aviv. He learned from one of the sport's first instructors, Eli Ben Ami, who in turn was taught by krav maga's founder, Imi Lichtenfeld. Kashani also counts krav maga master Gabi Noah as one of his mentors.



Rafi Kashani

Lichtenfeld, a boxer and wrestler, taught a martial arts discipline to fellow Jews in Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, to protect them from fascist thugs in the 1930s. After moving to Israel, he further developed the system that was to become krav maga and taught it to army units, including the Palmach, the pre-state militia.

Over the years, krav maga has evolved, changing with the times and adapting to the dangers people face. It is, Kashani said, "a street system for life."

In the 1940s, it could be seen as a salad, with identifiable ingredients from different martial arts disciplines. Today, it's more like a soup with all the previous elements blended to such an extent that they barely resemble their predecessors, he said.

Krav maga offers a "toolkit" of techniques that give people the wherewithal to defend themselves. Though it has evolved into "a soup," what's left is a powerful combat system that is designed to protect everyone from a senior accosted on the street to a professional providing security services to VIPs, Kashani said.

He has two Toronto-area studios where he presents the full krav maga "toolkit" to students. One is in Mississauga, the other in Vaughan. The Vaughan facility features a 2,000-square-foot space with floor mats, heavy bags for striking, padded shields for protection and even a small rock wall for climbing. That works muscles other than those used in fighting, Kashani explained.

People train in their everyday clothes, like T-shirts and sweat pants, because when trouble comes calling, that's what you'll be wearing. His students range in age from four to 74 and they come from all backgrounds. He has even trained police officers and recruits about to enter the police force.

Krav maga is particularly relevant for law enforcement officers, he said. "It teaches a more efficient way to arrest, to search or defend in a situation."

In approaching a dangerous situation, students are trained to observe, evaluate and find the best way of defusing the situation, Kashani said.

For Kashani, krav maga provided an escape route from a life of petty crime that started when he was only 10. Already running with a bad crowd, Kashani was caught by police trying to pry open a car window. His mom rescued him by hooking him up with Ben Ami, who took him under his wing and trained him in krav maga. Kashani spent long hours in his studio, working on his technique, getting fit and doing his best to please his coach. It kept him off the streets and out of trouble.

At 14, Kashani completed an instructor's course and by 18, he was an expert. He served in the military for five years – he won't say which unit he served in, only that he used krav maga – and in 2005, he left the army.

Later that year he moved to Canada. His first job was selling Dead Sea products in malls around town. He got married, had a son, was divorced.

Eager to find a more active line of work, he switched jobs. He worked in the construction industry until he suffered a severe hand injury. After reconstructive surgery, he was told he wouldn't be able to make a fist again. But not content to take no for an answer, "I decided to rehabilitate myself," he said.

Part of the rehab included trips back to Israel to train. He employed some of the self-defence drills taught by Ben Ami to recover motion in his hand. It was very painful, but it worked. His hand is now almost completely healed, Kashani said.

As he got better, he began to offer private lessons. Word spread, and the number of people eager for instruction grew. One thing led to the other, and he now has the two studios on the go.

Although krav maga is known as an Israeli martial art system, Palestinian students train at his Mississauga studio.

"They see Israel now in a new light," Kashani said.

They even wear Kashani's Israel krav maga T-shirts proudly, showing that krav maga "is a bridge for peace," he said.

Actress says playing Anne Frank is 'a rite of passage'

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Sara Farb did not have to look far for inspiration when she heard she would be playing Anne Frank at this year's Stratford Festival.

Farb's grandmother, Helen Yermus, and Farb's great-grandmother endured the Stutthof concentration camp and survived. Like Anne Frank, Yermus kept a diary as a young girl.

"It's been ingrained in my upbringing," Farb tells The CJN in Stratford, during the week of the show's dress rehearsal. "I thankfully know quite a bit about [my grandmother's] experience and I'm glad about that.

"I would understand if she didn't want to talk about it, but it's so important that she does."

Farb and her grandmother will speak in a program before the performance on June 10 about Yermus' experiences in the Shoah. Yermus was born in Lithuania and resided in the Kovno Ghetto before her transfer to Stutthof.

"It's so important to expose everybody to as many survivors as possible," Farb says. "I'm so, so proud that she's agreed to share [her story] with everybody and I'm so amazed by her."

Farb considers playing Anne Frank "a rite of passage" as a Jewish actor.

Now, she will play the character in two different shows: in The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford's Avon Theatre, which opens May 28, and in The Secret Annex at The Segal Centre in Montreal next winter. The Secret Annex envisions an alternate universe where Anne survived and is trying to get her diary published.

Jillian Keiley, who helmed Alice Through the Looking-Glass at last year's festival, directs the Stratford production.

To prepare for the role, Farb read Anne's diary various times, as well as other biographies. Still, she says the production is not as much a re-enactment of the story of Anne's two-year stay hidden in the Achterhuis, a secret annex above her father's office, but a telling that deals with how the story has endured through the generations.

"The way we open the show is widely unconventional," Farb says. "It lifts the curse of treating it like reverential, historical presentation. It becomes much, much easier to insert ourselves into the experiences of these people."

Farb is now one of Stratford's most in-demand actors, after well-received festival turns as Cordelia in King Lear and Jessica in The Merchant of Venice. This season, beyond her role as Anne Frank, she also stars in She Stoops to Conquer (opening June 4) and The Last Wife (opening August 14).

When Farb began rehearsals for The Diary of Anne Frank back in February, she was at the tail end of R-E-B-E-C-C-A, a one-woman show she wrote and performed at Theatre Passe Muraille in Toronto. The show was about Farb's sister, who has a developmental delay, and the stigmas of living with a disability.

"I had to condition my brain to exist in such different ways of thinking," Farb says, adding that it was a relief to be around other actors again. "It really made me appreciate the necessity of having a company."

Meanwhile, the play's staging coincides with an exhibition on the Holocaust and Anne's story. Featuring artifacts from the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, the exhibit will open at the Stratford Perth Museum on June 6.

Even with three productions on her plate this summer and fall, Farb says she still has her mind on writing plays – another element that connects her with the young Anne.

"To have a finger in different pots is comforting," she says. "It still makes me feel at ease to know that I'm capable of something if this all falls through."

Otto, Anne's father and the family's only survivor, helped bring Anne's diary to publication. Originally printed in 1947, The Diary of a Young Girl has sold more than 30 million copies to date and been translated to more than 60 languages.

Farb, 28, is likely one of the oldest actors to play Anne, who died in the Bergen-Belzen concentration camp at just 15. However, the young woman possessed a maturity and eloquence that bridges the age gap, Farb says.

"I don't think I ever really clued in to how prophetic she was, or how wise," she says. "In her writing she'll alternate between such beautiful metaphorical imagery, and then trash Mrs. van Daan for something so trivial and show what a girl she is.

"Now as an adult, I can appreciate why that's so remarkable in a young person. She's just such a special person." ■

The Diary of Anne Frank, directed by Jillian Keiley, runs at Stratford Festival May 28 to Oct. 10. www.stratfordfestival.ca

Healthier ways to enjoy the holiday

AHUVA MAGDER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It is traditional to eat dairy foods on Shavuot, when the Jewish People received the Ten Commandments, to commemorate a time when the Jewish People did not yet have the halachic dietary laws of milk and meat.

The tradition of eating dairy in lieu of meat can give us the illusion that we are "eating lighter," giving us the leeway to weigh down our meals with heavy creams and cheeses. And as you can imagine, the heavier the dairy, the heavier we find ourselves after the holiday!

Shavuot doesn't have to be a nutrition disaster.

Though the cheesecakes and blintzes that are normally the stars of the show are high in saturated fat, dairy foods like low fat Greek yogurt, cottage cheese and milk are good sources of calcium and vitamin D for strong bones, and protein, which helps with muscle repair and keeps you feeling full so that you don't reach for that second (or fourth) slice. So, instead of celebrating how many varieties of cheesecake slices we can eat, why not take this opportunity to celebrate healthy, calcium-rich foods and bring them into the spotlight.

That's not to say that no treats are allowed. But when trying to maintain a healthy weight over the two days of Shavuot plus Shabbat, remember to celebrate a holiDAY. That means choosing just one day or one meal when you will eat your favourite Shavuot foods.

For many people, saying "absolutely no" to all our favourites over the holiday leads to a frantic faceplant into a full cheesecake, and then some. And, too often, having "just a taste" of the desserts at every meal really translates into a combination of eating a full serving of dessert, yet feeling deprived at the same time.

To avoid both of these pitfalls, choose one meal to be your "holiday" meal. If you love your cheesecake, have a slice. If cheese-laden lasagna is your favourite, indulge in that! And as for all other meals, keep them as close as possible to what you would eat on any given Sunday.

Another common holiday mistake is skipping breakfast.

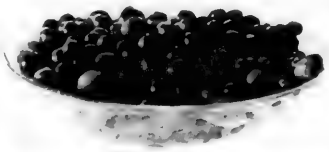
If you're looking for a couple of hundred "extra" calories to spend on lunch, dinner and dessert, skipping breakfast might seem like the perfect opportunity, and it will certainly feel that way until lunchtime, when you're hungry enough to gnaw someone's arm off – and then all good choices go out the window!

Sit down to a dairy filled, protein rich breakfast like overnight oats (see recipe) to keep you feeling full. This can make it easier to turn down the more calorie-rich options later on in the day.

Moderation is key.

The good news is that even if you do over-indulge on this holiday, you can always get out and enjoy the long days and beautiful weather. While the weather is warm, resist the urge to nap and get outside! Walking is a great way to burn off some extra calories, so don't be afraid to make plans to walk over to visit friends who live further away. Having to get home is a great motivation for walking!

As always, holidays and sharing meals are about enjoying being with friends and family, many of whom are also trying to watch their weight. Deciding from the beginning that this will be a time of healthy eating, you can agree to turn down sweets at every meal. Trust me, your friends and family will thank you too!



Overnight Oats

Serves one, but you're going to want to multiply!

- ❑ ½ cup oatmeal uncooked
- ❑ ½ cup low fat Greek yogurt
- ❑ ½ cup defrosted berries
- ❑ ½ cup milk

Combine ingredients in a cup or bowl. Leave in the fridge overnight and top as desired!

Variations:
Top with ground walnuts and a sliced banana.

Use sliced apple, sprinkle cinnamon and a drizzle of honey.

Prepare with coconut Greek yogurt. Top with shredded coconut and sliced pineapple for "pina colada" in a bowl!

The oldest existing synagogue in Portugal is reborn

DON AND LINDA FREEDMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Have you ever visited an ancient synagogue and cried with joy at its beauty?

We had the opposite experience in Azores in the fall of 2006. What we saw brought tears and anger. The place was on the verge of collapse. Termites had been feasting, water had been pouring through holes in the walls and ceilings, and stairways, floors and window casings were rotting.

The sanctuary with its beautiful Ark, bimah and dark, wooden benches is located behind what was the rabbi's family's living quarters. Light from the windows of the balcony and the high ceiling should have offered the feeling of tranquillity one expects at a house of worship. But in this case, the light revealed the utter neglect and total disregard for the ceremonial and religious objects. We lifted the seats of the benches where we found tallitot, tfillin and prayer books covered with rodent droppings, mould and dirt. We found untold documents in similar condition in cabinets and drawers. It was a disgrace, literally a crying shame.

This was the Sahar Hassamain (Gates of Heaven) Synagogue in Ponta Delgada, Sao Miguel, Azores, Portugal.

We were shown around by José De Almeida Mello, historian and champion of preserving Azorean culture and heritage. He had recently been assigned the monumental task and responsibility of co-ordinating the effort to restore the synagogue and preserve the heritage and culture of the early Azorean Jewish presence and its impact on the history of the islands.

It is believed, though undocumented, that the Jewish people came to the Azores, a cluster of nine volcanic islands in the North Atlantic Ocean, during the 15th and 16th centuries. The first documented settlement of Jews began in 1818 with the largest community in Ponta Delgada, Sao Miguel. There were 150 Jewish people residing in Sao Miguel, Terceira and Faial in the 19th century.

Today there is one Jew, Jorge Delmar Soares, who resides in Ponta Delgada. When we arrive each winter, the Jewish population increases to three.

The synagogues of Terciera and Faial are long gone. Ponta Delgada had five synagogues and nearby Vila Franca do Campo had one. The Sahar Hassamain Synagogue, built in 1836, is the only one remaining and has the distinction of being the oldest existing synagogue in Portugal.

Mello worked tirelessly with diligence and devotion to bring all public and private stakeholders together. In November 2009 he wrote and published his book, Sahar Hassamain Synagogue in Ponta Delgada, which became the catalyst for progress.

Reborn Ponta Delgada Synagogue

In March, we met Mello at Rua Do Brum 14-16, this time with tears of joy. The façade of the synagogue maintains its anonymity. Painted white, as is customary, with a gold accent at street level, the interior beautifully preserves the past with an eye towards the future. The new museum and archive spaces are bright and airy. The restoration of all elements of the sanctuary are exquisite. Thanks to donations, the new museum and archives have a representative collection of documents, letters, books and religious artifacts and the sanctuary now has five Torahs and new prayer books and Bibles. The inauguration and grand opening of the newly refurbished synagogue took place on April 23.

Mello's office is now fittingly located in the synagogue overlooking the sanctuary as he now administers the activities of the shul. The opening hours are 1 to 4:15 p.m. Monday to Friday.

We also visited the Jewish cemetery in 2006, which was in terrible condition with crumbling monuments, overgrown cactus, litter and weeds. Fortunately it was repaired and cleaned some years ago. It's located on Rua Santa Clara surrounded by a concrete wall and an outer wall of an abandoned fish factory. Approximately 160 people are buried there.

We suggest you make your visit part of a larger Jewish heritage tour of Portugal: in Porto, the Kadoorie Synagogue; in Lisbon, the Kehilat Beit Israel and Shaare Tikvah Synagogues; in Belmonte, the Bet Eliahu Synagogue and the Synagogue of Tomar. If our experience is any indication, you will be warmly welcomed by all. ■

Don and Linda Freedman have written about the synagogues of Portugal and much more on their website www.thetravelzine.com

The syngagoue was 'a disgrace, literally a crying shame.' DON AND LINDA FREEDMAN PHOTOS

Sata International operates direct flights from Toronto (and Boston) to Ponta Delgada and the Portuguese mainland. The airline also has flights between the Azorean islands, Madeira and key European destinations.
The median temperatures range from 16C in the winter to 24C in the summer. Situated in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, less than 4,000 km from New York and 1,400 km from Lisbon, it is a 5-1/2 flight from Toronto to Ponta Delgada. São Miguel, the largest island of the archipelago.

New memoir shows nuances of chassidic and secular life

jshupac@thecjn.ca

All Who Go Do Not Return
by Shulem Deen
Graywolf Press

There can be a certain voyeuristic pleasure in reading accounts of those who've left extremist religious sects.

This is evidenced by the popularity of memoirs like Deborah Feldman's Unorthodox: The Scandalous Rejection of My Hasidic Roots (2012) and Leah Vincent's Cut Me Loose: Sin and Salvation After My Ultra-Orthodox Girlhood (2014).

These books offer the alluring prospect of gaining an unfettered, if subjective, glimpse into a world ordinarily sealed off by stringent codes of propriety and ideology and, somewhat perversely, the chance to be absorbed without consequence into a society governed by zeal.

This said, Shulem Deen's new memoir All Who Go Do Not Return, which chronicles the writer's life in and eventual expulsion from an insular chassidic Skverer community, leaves the reader with few illusions about the challenges, but also the joys, of ultra-Orthodox and secular societies.

From a liberal Jewish perspective, the environment depicted shows Jewish law taken to radical, sometimes cruel, extremes.

And yet, Deen, now 40 and a secular resident of hipster Brooklyn, writes of losing his faith, and ultimately his family, without demonizing those that came to shun him or romanticizing modern life.

Of the clandestine drives he used to take from the Skverer village of New Square, outside New York City, into Greenwich Village, he mused, "Here too, I was sure, there were unhappy lives, stalled careers, loves lost...Here too there was the need to conform, with social codes just as arbitrary and stifling. Yet I would return, again and again, drawn to the mystique of freedom."

A genuine believer for years, Deen started out as a disaffected adolescent, the product of a chassidic family that he vaguely portrays as not quite stable – where the book disappoints is in Deen's choppy references to his childhood and nuclear family.

Raised in Brooklyn's Borough Park neighbourhood, Deen tried to conceal from his cheder teachers what he perceived as the humiliating fact of his father not allying with any particular chassidic group – neither Breslover, Satmar nor Skverer.

At 13, Deen chose to attend a Skverer yeshiva in Williamsburg, Brooklyn (from which he was eventually expelled for truancy) because "they weren't very selective and administered no entrance exam."

He was later sent to a yeshiva in Montreal where the Satmar rabbis nearly kicked him out for insolence, but gave him a second chance after he begged for forgiveness.

Deen then committed himself to a life of piety and scholarship and was permitted to re-enter the Skverer yeshiva, where he studied before attending the group's flagship institution in New Square.

Known for its rigidity, the Skverer sect originated in Ukraine and reassembled post Holocaust in the village of New Square, where Skverers comprise most of the less than 10,000 chassidic inhabitants.

Skverers live highly regulated lives dictated by their rebbe, speak only Yiddish and scorn modern technology.

Even as a wayward teen, Deen was transformed by a spiritually uplifting New Square tish – a Shabbat gathering involving singing, dancing and eating food passed from the hand of the rebbe. He writes:

"Here was the ecstasy and the joy. Here was all that I had been told we Chassidim once had and lost. 'The teaching of the Baal Shem Tov have been forgotten,' the old rebbe of Satmar had famously said, but here among the Skverers, they appeared not to be forgotten at all."

For nearly two decades Deen was, outwardly at least, a conscientious member of the Skverer community, but over time he was assailed by doubts – about the primacy of the rebbe, the legitimacy of the Torah as the word of God, the restrictions placed on accessing contemporary sources of information and the lack of secular education available to Skverers, which made it nearly impossible to earn a decent wage.

He described the awkwardness of being pressured, at 18, to marry a woman he'd only met for seven minutes.

Upon confessing his reservations to his "groom instructor," he was told, "A wife is not a friend. A wife is not something to think about excessively…A wife is there to assist with one's service to God, nothing more."

Shulem Deen then, as a Skverer Chassid (left) and now (right), as a secular Brooklynite.

Deen doesn't pin the dissolution of his faith on a single event, but describes a years-long process of surreptitious exposure to outside influences – radio, television, the Internet, books – and of coming to view the Bible as a text that "had the markings of human rather than divine authorship… Beautiful, intricate, layered in poetry and metaphor and heart-stopping drama, but human nonetheless."

He writes eloquently of desperately wishing his beliefs would return despite realizing that, "like a broken porcelain dish, the piece might be glued back together and the dish might hold for a while but soon enough it would break again, along that very same crack."

After finally getting a divorce and leaving New Square, Deen's newfound sense of freedom is tempered by the sorrow of losing his children, who appear to be influenced by community members to sever contact with him.

Even in his most painful recollections, Deen deftly captures the nuances of both his old and new lives, treating his nostalgia for the faith that once anchored him with no less reverence than the pleasures he finds in modern society: secular education, friendships, dating and writing professionally.

At a Shabbat dinner with fellow ex-Orthodox friends, Deen describes a moment of elevation similar to the one he experienced at his first Skverer tish, evoking the bittersweet experience of his transition:

"Soon we were singing, banging fists on our host's table in time to Chassidic songs from our youth…about the God we did not believe in and the Torah we did not follow. The songs were still beautiful, and we rose and rested our hands on another's shoulders…We'd made our choices and were proud of them and, despite the challenges, lived with few regrets."■

Oboist wins Ben Steinberg's Musical Legacy Award

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ron Cohen Mann, the winner of this year's Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, plays oboe, a double-reed instrument that's notoriously difficult to play but allows players a fair bit of control over the sound that's produced.

Oboists make their own reeds by hand – there's even a how-to book sold online – in order to create the instrument's sound, Cohen Mann said. "That puts you in a position of empowering you to create the sound, in whatever direction and esthetic that appeals to you."

He added that although the oboe is difficult to play he loves the challenge of performing on the instrument.

Israeli-born, Cohen Mann, 24, lived in the Netherlands with his family until he was 12, when they immigrated to Canada. While attending Seycove Secondary School in North Vancouver, he played piano in two jazz bands and accompanied a jazz choir on piano. He also played flute for a couple of years and then switched to oboe at 14.

"When I started oboe, I took it pretty seriously," he said, adding that his first teacher was Roger Cole, the principal oboist for the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra.

At the time, Cohen Mann didn't know where the oboe would lead him, but he said he did have dreams of becoming a professional oboist. He joined Vancouver's Youth Orchestra, which he said was his "first opportunity to play with talented colleagues who ended up studying at conservatories and universities."

Cohen Mann studied for his bachelor's degree in music at the University of British Columbia, where he was awarded the UBC Medal in Music. He went on to earn a master's degree at the Mannes School of Music at The New School in New York, and is currently studying for an artist diploma at the Yale School of Music, in New Haven, Conn.

Cohen Mann has performed with the Manhattan Symphonie, L'Orchestre de la Francophonie, the National Academy Orchestra of Canada and Vancouver Metropolitan Orchestra, among others, and with the National Youth Orchestra of Canada at Carnegie Hall, Lincoln Center, Koerner Hall in Toronto, and Maison Symphonique in Montreal. He's also active in solo and chamber music at frequent recitals.

"I'm very much a performer," Cohen Mann said, adding that as a child he used to put on puppet shows for friends and family. "I found a performer's voice in the oboe," he continued.

He was a prizewinner at the 2014 Orchestre Symphonique de Montreal Standard Life Competition 2014, and the winner of the Yamaha Young Performing Artists Competition 2013. "I came in with the mentality of just wanting to create beautiful music," he said. "Putting the music first and foremost is the best you can do."

Ron Cohen Mann

> I found a performer's voice in the oboe

The consummate performer also teaches with Yale School of Music's Music in Schools Initiative, and last year he was an oboe instructor at Yale. "I come from a long line of teachers," he said, adding that his mother, Michal, teaches psychology at the graduate level, and his grandmother, Judith, taught at the Shema Center for the Deaf and Hearing Impaired in Israel.

Toronto audiences can hear Cohen Mann play at a free May 27 recital at Temple Sinai. The temple established the musical legacy award 32 years ago. Named after Temple Sinai's former director of music, Ben Steinberg in 1996, the award aims to encourage the careers of young Jewish artists in the Canadian community as well as the performance of music by Jewish composers.

At the recital, Cohen Mann will perform oboe sonatas by Vivaldi and Henri Dutilleux, two fantasy pieces by Karl Nielson and a concerto in one movement by Eugene Goossens. Most concertos are written for a solo instrument and an orchestra, but the Goossens piece "was originally conceived for oboe and piano," Cohen Mann said. The recital also includes Jewish melodies by the Russian composer Joseph Achron. "He's done a transcription for violin and piano, which I'll be adjusting for oboe," Cohen Mann said

Accompanying Cohen Mann on piano will be Chatham, Ont., native Benjamin Smith. "He's wonderfully expressive. When I heard I was doing a recital in Toronto, he was the first person I thought of," Cohen Mann said. Cohen Mann and Smith perform at Temple Sinai on May 27 at 8 p.m. ■

From neonates to geriatrics

Dr. Michael Gordon

Many CJN readers of my column recall references to my writing in Aroma cafes in Israel. The chain's expansion to Toronto has been good news to many familiar with Israel who compare the attributes of the coffee when comparing coffee shop qualities.

Recently, while visiting the country for a conference, I found myself sitting in the Rambam Hospital complex Aroma café in Haifa. I was with professors Shraga Blazer, the renowned head of neonatology at Rambam, and Tzvi Dwolatzky, recently appointed director of its newly inaugurated geriatric services.

It was a very warm encounter, the result of a series of "happenstance" occurrences. I, a geriatrician came to visit Shraga because as editor-in-chief of the Rambam Medical Journal, he had been in recent communication with me about an article soon to be published in the journal, in which I address how medical technologies have intruded themselves into the end-of-life rituals and the rites of dying process. I decided that a visit to Haifa, an hour train ride from Tel Aviv would be illuminating. What I did not realize was that Dwolatzky, now a colleague of Shraga, would join us at the Aroma café.

The connection I have with Dwolatzky stems from the years he spent at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, where I did two years of medical residency, followed by his time at Ben-Gurion University's Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva. It was there that he created one of the early computerized assessment programs for cognitive function, the goal being to try and differentiate those with mild or not-clinically apparent cognitive impairment from those with "normal" brain functioning.

This program was the first of its kind in Israel. Now, computer-based cognitive function assessment has developed elsewhere, including at Baycrest Health Sciences under the Cognicity program.

It remains to be demonstrated whether, if found to accurately discriminate between those with "normal" function and those with some deficiency, these tools can lead to interventions that change the trajectory of cognitive decline.

But as an outcome of such research, it is currently recommended that physical and mental exercise programs are activities that individuals can do to possibly decrease their own risk of developing cognitive impairment, while other pharmaceutical or supplemental interventions are being sought.

From the other side of the age spectrum, I was shown the remarkable neo-natal unit at the recently opened Ruth Rappaport Children's Hospital at Rambam. Shraga showed me the units in which bassinets held infants of such low weight and premature birth dates that years ago, they would not have been considered viable. Israel is a leader in neonatology research and clinical practice.

I told Shraga the story of my own premature birth when they had recently introduced 100 per cent oxygen into the therapeutic milieu. For some uncanny reason, my maternal bubbie, with whom my parents lived at the time and with whom my younger sister and I thereafter resided until her death when I was 12, did not like the attending physician. She convinced my parents to have me moved to a less "advanced" hospital's neonatal unit that did not adopt the 100 per cent oxygen therapy clinical intervention – thereby likely saving me from lifelong blindness, which was eventually found to occur in neonates exposed to 100 per cent oxygen because of a condition called retrolental fibroplasia.

Although not the only factor, the enhanced oxygen therapy has been shown to be one of the causes of this condition. All my life, as I heard the story recounted, I attributed to my bubbie's intuition the fact that I have normal sight.

So again, in a coffee shop, one that is very popular in Israel and now in Toronto, I had an inspiring meeting with two physicians who, along with me, span the whole of the life cycle – from neonates to the very elderly. ■

Bamidbar | Numbers 1:1 – 4:20

Yacov Fruchter says Jews need to possess a united heart in order to truly receive the Torah
Rabbi Shalom Spira explains how the laws of eruv could apply to Montreal's Sherbrooke Street
Rachael Turkienicz on the transformative wilderness experience that defines the book of Bamidbar

Yacov Fruchter

Something incredible, almost unthinkable happened to the Jewish People as they prepared to receive the Torah: they were united. When they arrived at Har Sinai, it is written, "Vayichan sham Yisrael neged ha'har"

"The children of Israel encamped there, adjacent to the mountain." Rashi famously quotes a midrash that explains a strange element of the phrase that's lost in translation. Why is the word "encamped" written in the singular "vayichan"?

The answer? At that moment, they were like one person with one heart. Wow! How powerful! In order to receive the Torah, we needed to possess a united heart.

Sadly, Rashi does not stop there. He adds that this heightened unity was only present in this one instance, for all other encampments were mired with division and strife.

How can we return to that moment of glory? Why is it that as wandering Jews, we find a way to continuously wander away from one another? Machloket leshem Shamayim – an argument for the sake of heaven – has always been a healthy part of being Jewish, and yet we have lost the ability to keep the heart whole.

The tragic events in Israel last summer were a clear example of a divided encampment, and the hate spewed liberally about it was incredibly painfully to watch and read.

Our second daughter was born on the 10th of Av, the day after Tisha b'Av, marking the destruction of the Temple caused by baseless hatred. As an expression of our hope for the Jewish People, we named her Lev Amie – "the heart of our nation" – so that she would be a constant reminder of what we can accomplish when our heart is in the same place.

Chag Samayach. ■

"And all the enumerated were 603,550" (Numbers 1:46). This census bears a practical ramification for eruv architecture, because Tosafot to Shabbat 6b interpret the Gemarah to mean that only a thoroughfare that accommodates this number of pedestrians daily should be classified as a public domain.

A thoroughfare with fewer visitors can be symbolically enclosed by an eruv, a marginal network of doorframe structures (typically synthesized from poles and wires) before the Sabbath, in order to permit carrying on the Sabbath.

Already during the 18th century, when only a handful of cities (Beijing, Ayutthaya, Delhi, Istanbul and Tokyo) were inhabited by 60 myriad (600,000) citizens Ba'al Shem Tov – cited by Rabbi Rafael Blum in Tal ha-Shamayim (Brooklyn, 5718) – observed that the validity of an eruv is one of the three kashrut topics that should be furiously debated. Pointing to the Haftorah for the second day of Shavuot, which reads, "With fury [za'am], you march through the world" (Habbakuk 3:12), he expanded za'am as an acronym to represent zevichah (slaughtered meat), eruvin and mikva'ot.

Even more so today, our vibrant metropolises have sparked illuminating conflicts regarding how to measure the presence of 60 myriad citizens, that will disqualify an eruv. A survey of the various opinions is presented by Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Wechter-Rabinovitch in Eizehu Reshut ha-Rabim (Brooklyn, 5768). Some gauge total regional population with theoretical access to the city; others evaluate how many people actually visit one of the city avenues; yet others reckon one boulevard at a time with its specific pedestrian load. Some include vehicle passengers while others do not.

To that effect, a census of 591,271 human beings (even including vehicle passengers) frequenting Montreal's Sherbrooke Street daily was recently taken. Assuming that the statistical methodology is accurate, many poskim, legal decisors, will accept Sherbrooke Street's Westmount eruv. ■

As we begin to read the book of Numbers, the very first thing to notice is the difference between the English and Hebrew titles of the book. In English, we call it "Numbers" and in Hebrew it is "Bamidbar," "In the Wilderness." So, of course, we must ask: what's the significance of a title?

The old adage, "You can't judge a book by its cover," is only true of the content and style but not of the focus. We can determine the focus of the text by its title. In fact, the title will determine our focus and direct our reading. It is of crucial importance, since it will influence the meaning we seek within the book.

The English title for this book, Numbers, is based on the fact that a census of Israel is taken and will determine the numbers within the nation. It is about facts and figures and structures and process.

The Hebrew title, In the Wilderness, is about transformation. The wilderness, or desert, is defined by its lack of reference points. One sand dune looks like another and might well be gone in an hour because of the wind. When people enter the wilderness, they suspend all previous identifiers and attain new reference points. They transform and grow. It is not about numbers, figures and structures, but rather about vision, imagination and adventures.

The holiday of Shavuot embodies this same exciting anticipation as we all stand at Sinai anxiously awaiting what will come. The sages tell us that all Jews that were, and all Jews that are to be, stood together at Sinai. We understand that statement as the science of DNA, while they understood it as the power of the Jewish soul.

As we stood at Sinai ready to begin our wilderness journey, we all understood and carried with us the power of transformation. ■

Mom fundraises for CF to help son

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Raising funds for cystic fibrosis (CF) has become Natalie Doyle's life mission.

Her son, Liam, is almost three years old and was born with CF. Her daughter Madelynn, 4, was not, but she could be a carrier.

Her third child, Tristan, had CF. Tristan was born last September, but passed away shortly thereafter.

"I lost Tristan at 5-1/2 months. He was diagnosed with congenital heart disease and CF. When the kids ask where baby Tristan is, I tell them he is up in the stars and he is watching over you," Doyle said sadly.

Both Natalie and her husband, Jamey, are genetic carriers for CF, but neither knew it before they had children. On May 31, Doyle will walk together with some 100 people at the second annual Carstar's Great Strides Walk for Cystic Fibrosis Canada in Richmond Hill.

"Last year we raised $15,000. I am hoping to beat that this year," Doyle said.

The event happens across the country the last Sunday in May. There will also be a walk at the Toronto Zoo.

"We have over 60 sites this year from British Columbia to Nova Scotia. We are hoping to raise $3.5 million nationally from all of the walks combined," said Jessica Raposo, fund development co-ordinator for Cystic Fibrosis Canada's Toronto area chapter.

Walkers raise funds for vital CF research, care and advocacy, initiatives funded by Cystic Fibrosis Canada to help find a cure or treatment for the disease.

Madelynn Doyle helps her little brother Liam with one of his daily treatments: inhaling a saline solution that helps loosen sticky mucus in his lungs.

CF is the most common fatal genetic disease affecting Canadian children and young adults. There is no cure. It is a multi-system disease affecting mainly the lungs and digestive system.

Symptoms can include difficulty breathing, respiratory tract problems, severe and chronic lung infections, impaired growth or weight gain, and extreme difficulty digesting and absorbing nutrients from food.

"Liam takes his enzymes. Without them he wouldn't be able to digest the nutrients that he needs. He takes them with every meal and every snack."

Doyle's mother, bubbie Julie Parnes, watches Liam and his sister during the workweek.

"Mom does one of Liam's therapies called CPT [chest physical therapy], where you tap on his front side and back for three minutes each, where his lungs are. This helps shift the sticky mucous. It gets done twice a day," she said.

"When I look at Liam, I don't just think of CF anymore. He is now becoming this independent boy – loving, caring, sensitive, sweet and very active. He knows why we do the therapy to keep him healthy and to keep his lungs healthy. He knows he must take his enzymes so his tummy doesn't hurt," Doyle said.

CF occurs when a child inherits two defective copies of the gene responsible for the condition, one from each parent. One in 25 Canadians is a CF carrier, but many people are unaware of it. When two carriers have a child, there's a 25 per cent chance their child will be born with CF.

According to the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Registry, in 2013, half of those who died of the condition were under 35. As well, 57 per cent of those newly diagnosed were under six months of age. It's estimated that someone born with CF in Canada today has a 50 per cent chance of living beyond age 50, up from age 25 in 1983.

"The scariest part of this disease is that he is OK today, but in an instant everything can change. That is what I struggle with daily. I am constantly waiting for the other shoe to drop," said Doyle.

Richmond Hill Mayor Dave Barrow will kick off the three-kilometre walk at 8:30 a.m. with a ribbon cutting ceremony at Mill Pond Park in Richmond Hill. ■

Sex ed. curriculum last updated in 1998

"We have not as of yet fully analyzed the curriculum... and had enough meaningful discussions internally to comment, but we will certainly be focused on this in the months ahead."

The provincial sex education curriculum was last updated in 1998.

The Liberal government backed away from an attempted update of it in 2010 after protests by some religious leaders, including prominent evangelical Christian Rev. Charles McVety.

At the time, "we met with other groups who were opposed to it to plan strategy," said Rabbi Asher Vale, director of the Beis Din, Vaad Harabonim of Toronto.

> We have not as of yet fully analyzed the curriculum

"We need to bring it up again to the Vaad," he added.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, said the board "has not yet considered" whether to pronounce on the new curriculum.

Benjamin Cohen, principal at Bialik Hebrew Day School's Viewmount branch, had no comment when contacted by The CJN. Messages to Bialik's head of school were not returned.

Neither were calls and emails to Associated Hebrew Schools, the Toronto Heschel School, and Eitz Chaim Schools seeking comment on the sex ed curriculum or to discuss their teachings in the area. ■

Rabbi Steven Greenberg: Don't demonize gay Jews

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Temple Kol Ami, a Reform congregation in Thornhill, in April hosted Rabbi Steven Greenberg, often described as the first openly gay Orthodox Jewish rabbi, as its scholar in residence for a weekend of discussion sessions related to homosexuality and the Torah.

The Boston-based rabbi, author and speaker is executive director of Eshel, an organization that promotes acceptance of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Jews and their families in Orthodox communities.

He spoke to The CJN about addressing homosexuality across denominations, his sense of responsibility to gay Orthodox Jews, biblical interpretation and the future of Orthodox acceptance of LGBTQ Jews.

Rabbi Steven Greenberg

Was this your first time speaking at a Toronto synagogue?
My partner is an opera singer and he does chazzanut, and for the last two years, we've been going as a family to a really sweet little downtown minyan, Makom, and I've spoken a bunch of times there on High Holidays. But this is the first time speaking here at a standard synagogue.

How were the topics chosen for the discussions you led at Kol Ami?
It was a mix of my suggestions and Kol Ami Rabbi Micah Streiffer and his committee's ideas.

Is it typical for you to speak at, or be involved with, Reform synagogues, given that you're Orthodox?
I've been a Jewish educator for some 30 years, and many of those years were with the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership. Its founder, Yitz Greenberg, who's an Orthodox rabbi, had already, in the 1980s, begun to speak about the need for pluralism. I joined the team in the mid-'80s and have been a kind of pluralist voice in the Orthodox community since.

I've been involved in Jewish conversations around the Jewish future with all kinds of Jews of all kinds of denominations and ideologies. The Reform movement has taken the lead on discussing issues of gender and sexuality on the American Jewish scene. I typically go to a Reform synagogue with different aims, though they can overlap, than when I walk into an Orthodox environment.

But it's not unusual for me to speak at Orthodox, Reform or Reconstructionist shuls, and I've also spoken at churches. I'm an equal opportunity speaker in that sense.

When did you receive ordination as an Orthodox rabbi?
In 1983.

And when did you come out publicly?
I came out in 1999.

So are you considered Orthodox by the Orthodox movement?
It depends who you ask. When I first came out, one of the rabbis at Yeshiva University said there's no such thing as a gay Orthodox rabbi – you're a Reform rabbi. Indeed, plenty of my colleagues would say that, by coming out, I'm no longer Orthodox. But over the years, my insistence that this makes no sense and that I am Orthodox has picked up steam. So a bunch of my colleagues also would not dispute that I'm Orthodox.

Do you feel a sense of responsibility as the "only" openly gay Orthodox rabbi to nurture other Orthodox LGBTQ Jews and help ease their coming out processes?
Yes, of course. My aim is to encourage people who wish to stay connected to traditional Judaism, [to say] that there will be room within the community for them. That they should press on and hold their leaders and communities accountable, bring their families with them as allies and push to make room in the community for a dignified and loving presence of LGBTQ Jews and their families. So I spend a good deal of my time counselling both the individuals who are struggling and their families.

Do you also feel a similar sense of responsibility to non-Orthodox LGBTQ Jews?
I have to admit that while there are people in the Reform movement who are feeling lost, most of the families that want my counsel are on the traditional side.

But the reason I'm eager to speak to Reform Jews is, on some level, to restore a sense that the tradition has the capacity to open doors, and that they don't need to believe that the Torah itself is hateful toward gay and lesbian people.

I think that no matter how liberal you are, you still kind of hope that the tradition, even in its ancient forms, isn't as mean-spirited as you might have been taught. There's a desire to encounter a sense of Jewish memory that is a little healed, a more nuanced, thoughtful story can be told that restores people's trust in Torah and the rabbis' attempts to creatively read the text they were bequeathed.

I'm making room for a religious discourse around gender and sexuality, but I'm also demonstrating that a human approach to these issues is surprisingly available, even within the oldest and deepest resources of our shared memory as Jews. The old can be renewed, and the new can be sanctified, as Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of Israel, said.

So do you try to show people different interpretations for texts that seem black and white?
Sometimes I do, or I try to show that it was never read as black and white as they thought, or open them up to a more complex picture. I'm trying to restore people's faith that an ancient book can be read in successive generations and new insights can be found. That's what makes it eternal.

Do you read the prohibition against male homosexual sex in Leviticus as not being black and white?
I wouldn't put it like that. Any biblical text will have multiple readings, applications or ways of putting it alongside other texts that contend with it. In other words, there's hardly anything black and white anywhere.

Thou shall not kill sounds pretty black and white until you think, well, Jewish law clearly doesn't prohibit self-defence. So, on some level, every text comes up against competing realities, circumstances.

Then there's the linguistic side – you're reading it this way. It could have been read that way. So, when you say black and white, you're talking about a different religion, not Judaism.

Would other Orthodox rabbis agree with you on that?
Sure. It doesn't mean there aren't communal consensuses that have a lot of weight. But it also doesn't mean there's always a simple, unambivalent truth. Rabbis like to say that every word at Mount Sinai was heard in 70 different languages and 70 different ways, so the Torah is fractured into 70 different perspectives.

Any system of law or ethics has to interact with the multiple human perspectives engaging with it. That's not radical theology, that's talmudic theology.

Do you belong to an Orthodox synagogue?
Yes, I go to Kadimah-Toras Moshe in Boston. It's a complicated existence. My daughter was rejected from a local Orthodox day school that opened up an early learning program for pre-kindergarten kids. We were very excited when it opened, but were told to not even apply, that we wouldn't be accepted because of the nature of our family. Yet, we belong to a congregation that fully embraces me and my partner.

So, there are contradictions everywhere. For example, the Chabad school would be happy to have her. It's the modern Orthodox school that doesn't want her.

Do you think the Orthodox community is becoming more progressive regarding these issues?
I think there's no longer space for the demonization of gay and lesbian people in the Orthodox world. Even in the most traditional environments, I think there's recognition that people aren't choosing this, and there must be a basic empathy when approaching this. In the Orthodox world, there is still strong pressure to remain celibate if you're gay, but increasingly, younger rabbis and educators are recognizing there's something destructive in that request, and they're seeking ways to sustain their halachic perspective while being respectful of the mental health and emotional and religious well-being of gay and lesbian people and their families.

Do you see a time in the future when Orthodoxy will fully accept LGBTQ people?
I think given the diversity of what Orthodoxy is now, one couldn't say one blanket thing about all of it. The differences between the various enclaves in Orthodoxy are greater than those within the Reform or Conservative movements.

I'd say that some percentage of the Orthodox community will tacitly, without ideological fanfare, be welcoming of LGBTQ Jews – I'd say up to 30 per cent is not an unreasonable hope.

My aim at Eshel is to ensure there are at least 36 synagogues across North America where, if you or your child discovers yourself to be gay, lesbian or trans, you could choose from any of them and, if you want to, stay in a community with an expectation of observance and knowledge. Once we achieve that, I'll feel I've done my job. ■

Shavuot: Festival of Weeks

Backstory

SEYMOUR EPSTEIN

Why exactly is Shavuot called Shavuot, the festival of weeks? Think about the three pilgrimage festivals: Pesach is named for the "passing over" (pasach) of Israelite homes as God killed the first born Egyptians (Exodus 12:13). Sukkot is named for the booths (sukkot) we dwell in during that autumn holiday (Leviticus 23:42). What about Shavuot then? It's not named for the first fruits which it celebrates in the Torah (Leviticus 23:17), but rather for the counting of seven weeks from Pesach (Leviticus 23:15-16). Not quite the direct naming as Pesach and Sukkot enjoy. Why not?

The first clue is that the week of seven days is the only measurement of time in the Torah not based on nature. The day is based on the revolution of the earth on its axis. The month is based on the cycle of the moon's varied reflection of the sun's light. The year is the amount of time required for the earth to circle the sun. So while these three time periods are given their due in the Torah, the week appears arbitrary, a measurement imposed on us by the creation account in Genesis.

The week's end, the seventh day or Shabbat, is marked as significant by the famous passage of Genesis 2:1-3 in which God declares the seventh day as His holy Sabbath. It is significant that the days of the week, determined as they are by nature, are not given names, only numbers, while the last day of the week which delineates the week is given a name, Shabbat. In later Jewish tradition, even the weeks were given names in the form of the weekly Torah portion.

On the primal Pesach of Egypt, the Israelites were commanded to note the month as the first of months (Exodus 12:2) – an unlikely acknowledgement by slaves since one month for a slave is like any other. Here, however, not only will this month (chodesh) be new (chadash), but in fact, the slave will be transformed into a free individual who understands his ability to define time, his own included. But chapter 12 of Exodus not only gives precise instructions for that first Pesach of Egypt, but also for all subsequent Passovers of the generations to come (Exodus 12:14-20). The marking of this first month, which later became Nisan, is the first step of a new autonomous and liberated Israelite.

> Shavuot is the holiday that teaches us true autonomy

The trek through the desert begins the act of liberation. Later on, as our tradition has it, the first seven weeks of that trek are designated by God as a time of counting weeks. This too is a lesson in autonomy, since even a slave could note the new month by gazing at the moon, while only a free person can arbitrarily count off seven-day weeks which have no source in nature.

In other words, months are natural, weeks are history. Shavuot, then, is the holiday that teaches us true autonomy. Unlike Pesach, it was not celebrated the first time as the Hebrews were leaving Egypt, but was designed for future generations. It is deeply rooted in nature and celebrates the first fruits of the harvest – the very nature which yields no first fruits without the hard work of human farmers.

So the very name Shavuot hearkens back to the period when we formed our autonomy, our self-esteem. The time when we became masters of our own destiny.

Hence, the Torah metaphorically links Shavuot to the first fruits in the seven weeks when we gained the first fruits of our liberation. No accident then that the rabbis added the giving of the Torah at Sinai to Shavuot, thereby deepening the symbolism of an event also understood as a first fruits experience for the newly liberated Hebrews. ■

Israel to link benefits to vaccinations, and suspense master helped document Shoah

No shots, no cash

Under terms of Israel's new governing coalition, the state will deny child allowance benefits to parents who don't vaccinate their kids, the Times of Israel reported. The type of vaccines weren't named in the provision, which is similar to rules in Australia and re-opens a six-year-old debate on linking the shots to welfare benefits. It also comes as vaccination opt-out rates are climbing among haredim and Bedouins, who are among Israel's poorest citizens and depend on the handouts. Rights groups say the move discriminates against vulnerable groups and will deepen poverty rates.

Alfred Hitchcock

Holocaust film gets NYC premiere

German Concentration Camps Factual Survey, a documentary shot and scripted in 1945 with the help of legendary film director Alfred Hitchcock, had its New York premiere May 19 at the Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust. The newly completed film uses footage taken at Bergen-Belsen, Auschwitz and Dachau by combat and newsreel cameramen after liberation. Producer Sidney Bernstein enlisted Hitchcock, a close friend, as the film's treatment adviser. His influence can be seen in long, panning shots that show viewers the scenes in it are real. Britain's Imperial War Museum recently decided to finish the film, which was shelved by Britain after other films like it came out. It debuted last year at the Berlin International Film Festival.

Thank God the chips weren't pork rinds

A Montana man was charged with attempted homicide for shooting a bartender who served him a non-kosher drink. Monte Leon Hanson, 59, allegedly shot Joe Lewis, who is also his neighbour, and killed Lewis' dog the morning after Lewis made Hanson a red beer – beer and tomato juice – at his Hamilton bar with the Clamato tomato drink, which contains clam broth, rather than tomato juice. When Hanson learned the drink contained Clamato, he reportedly became angry, saying it was against his religion. He allegedly followed Lewis the next morning when he left their apartment building to take out his dog. ■

A dubious contest

It seems that in a recent poll conducted by the Israeli Society of Plastic and Aesthetic Surgery, Ayelet Shaked, Israel's new justice minister, was voted "best-looking female in the Knesset." ("New Israeli justice minister doesn't shy from controversy," May 14.)

I am wondering if the new justice minister's name was, say, Amir Shaked instead of Ayelet, would he be voted "best-looking male in the Knesset"?

Who should pay?

In a letter to the editor ("Funding for schools," May 14), Murray Rubin wrote, "Canada is a secular country, and the idea of supporting the Jewish separate schools with public money is outdated."

The facts are that Quebec, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan pay 40 to 60 per cent of the costs of secular subjects in Jewish day schools. Ontario is the outlier in Canada, a province that talks the talk of multiculturalism, but doesn't deliver.

Of course, we should look to the Jewish community to make day school education affordable for middle-income families. Again, the fact is that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto contributes $10 million a year to tuition subsidies. But it simply isn't enough and hasn't increased for years. Tuition costs, meanwhile, are rising three times faster than family incomes.

In Montreal, with provincial government funding in the picture, tuition costs are a third lower than in Toronto. As a result, more than 50 per cent of Jewish children attend day schools, compared to 32 per cent in Toronto.

We should never stop telling the Ontario government that it is unjust to refuse to fund secular studies in the Jewish day schools. The status quo in Ontario is an affront to conscience. We must make Jewish education in our community affordable for every family that wishes to send its children to a Jewish day school.

Intermarriage and continuity

Paul Golin's grandmother was right when she said that by "marrying someone non-Jewish, you'll be finishing Hitler's job." ("Intermarriage is an opportunity, Oraynu speaker says," May 14).

Golin is obviously trying to rationalize his choice of marrying outside of the faith with his ideas around reframing intermarriage in a positive light. Sounds like he's proud that he gets to have his cake and eat it, too, with the best of both worlds.

Clearly, he values his own needs above Jewish continuity, or he would have asked his spouse to convert. Choosing to marry Jewish is critical to our survival as a people.

I lost both sets of grandparents in the Holocaust and missed an opportunity to hear their wisdom. The moral of the story, Mr. Golin? Your grandmother knows best. You should have listened.

Pope's motives are suspect

In April, Pope Francis invited a delegation of rabbis from around the world to discuss anti-Semitism. These rabbis supposedly represented the Jews of the world. He asked forgiveness from the rabbis for the actions and/or inactions over the centuries of the Catholic Church in this regard.

Why did the Pope apologize? Was it a ruse? A facade? To blindside the Jews to his true intentions? What are his intentions? To see peace between Palestinian and Jew? Was it to lull the Jews into a false sense of security? I believe it was the latter – for shortly after that meeting, the Pope embraced Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, calling him "the angel of peace" and then supporting a Palestinian state.

This is where he dealt the Jews the ultimate betrayal. What in the Palestinian-Arab pledge "to wipe the Jews off the face of the earth" does he not understand? Or could this possibly be part of the church's plan, to dominate the Holy Land, Judenfrei?

So even while the Catholic church praises murderers, the U.S. Presbyterian church plots, world condemnation of Israel (and the Jews) continues and the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement gains momentum, Israel exists and flourishes.

May God continue to bless the Jewish nation. Hopefully one day all this madness will come to an end.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Are denominational labels necessary?

As many synagogues seek to define themselves by meta-values that transcend Judaism's major movements, perhaps congregations of different stripes can find common ground

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: One of the results, if not the purpose, of the Rabbi2Rabbi format is to demonstrate the remarkable similarities in thought and practice shared by rabbis of different denominations. Indeed, in our ongoing dialogue, we have mostly focused on shared concerns and overlapping experiences.

I am often asked about the difference between Conservative and Orthodox Judaism. In a city like Toronto, which has some of the most right-leaning Conservative congregations in North America situated in close proximity to modern Orthodox synagogues and partnership minyanim, the question is especially salient. I often explain that on a Jewish legal level, we are 98 per cent in sync, with some obvious differences pertaining to synagogue seating and less obvious liturgical dissimilarities.

Still, I think we better understand ourselves when we are able to define what sets us apart from others. When we are close on many matters, that process can be particularly fruitful. Moving beyond Halachah, how are we different? What are the issues about which we disagree? How do our worldviews diverge?

Rabbi Scheier: I imagine that, were we to focus on our differences, we would come down to two Ms: mechitzah and method of halachic decision-making. The mechitzah might symbolize all of the differences that visitors to our respective synagogues would easily observe, and we might differ in how we come to our halachic decisions, even if the decision are often the same – for example, we might use different sources or give different weight to the same Jewish legal sources.

If we are as similar as you claim, then of what value is denominational affiliation? It has now been many years since my congregation became independent in terms of affiliation – meaning, while the congregational standard is to be a synagogue that observes Halachah in every aspect of our communal conduct (and I am a proudly Orthodox rabbi), we remain unaffiliated with any particular movement.

Rabbi Cutler: The modern denominational system is a product of 19th-century Germany. The earliest Reform Jews found it necessary to create a distinct grouping, which enabled them to find common cause among their brethren and brought with it institutional support in the form of a synagogue association and rabbinical group.

These products, their descendants and sister groups – the Union for Reform Judaism and the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and the Rabbinical Assembly, as well as the Orthodox Union and the Rabbinical Council of America – continue to provide essential support for Jewish life in ways that are denominationally appropriate. There are many tasks that national or international groups can do that independent synagogues and rabbis are simply unable to accomplish.

Yet, we know that younger Jews are less likely to define themselves by any given denomination. In a generation that is ambivalent toward membership-based organizations and identity labels, these Jews may define themselves as "Just Jewish" or "halachically observant Jewish" or "post-denominational Jewish." In practice, much of what they do would be mainstream in my shul or yours, but they would prefer to forge their own Jewish identity rather than link it to a broader denomination.

I am not especially worried about this trend. Jewish organizations in general and synagogues in particular are sufficiently creative and flexible to serve the needs of this generation. I am excited to see what types of Judaism will be expressed in 50 years.

Rabbi Scheier: I agree with you that the larger association and rabbinical groups serve an important function, though I wonder what our world would look like if they were organized by a principle other than religious denomination.

As many synagogues seek to define themselves by meta-values that transcend the denominations, perhaps common ground might be found between, say, an Orthodox synagogue that is committed to social justice and a Reconstructionist synagogue with the same dedication. Or, for example, synagogues with a strong emphasis on music might band together to share resources and ideas, regardless of the ritual proclivities of that particular synagogue.

Perhaps our conversation can best be summed up by the words of Rabbi Yitz Greenberg: "It doesn't matter which [denomination you belong to], as long as you're ashamed of it."

I would add: it doesn't matter, as long as you're committed to furthering the denomination's ability to bring Jewish meaning and pride to our community, in all of its facets. ■

Finding a balance between state and religion

Last week, Rabbi David Lau, the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel, weighed in on the relationship between the Jewish State's political and religious leadership. At a conference in Eilat, Rabbi Lau urged Israel's new justice minister, Ayelet Shaked, to confer with the Chief Rabbinate on all legislation.

"I call on the justice minister," he said, "to establish that for every bill that the government submits, just as it seeks the professional opinion of relevant ministries on the matter, so, too, it should ask the Chief Rabbinate to present the Jewish and traditional position on the bill."

The rabbinate's aim, Rabbi Lau added, is "not to decide, but to give information, so that we will be conscious of the Jewish values of Hebrew law – so that we will be conscious of a Jewish bill for the Jewish state – and then the government can decide on it in a democratic way."

Religious leaders wield significant power in Israel, especially when it comes to marriage and divorce, conversion, kashrut certification and burial. The religious parties, Jewish Home, Shas and United Torah Judaism, also hold a crucial position in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's razor-thin coalition. And yet, many Israelis would maintain that Rabbi Lau's proposal is a bad idea, and that there must be a clear separation between state and religion.

Even so, Rabbi Lau's idea is worthy of consideration, and it's hard to see what the harm would be in adding the rabbinate into the legislative loop, especially given the chief rabbi's clarification that leading rabbis are not seeking decision-making powers. Their input could be informative, so long as it doesn't devolve into coercion.

But if the rabbis want to be involved in the process of lawmaking, perhaps there is an opportunity for lawmakers to wade into the rabbinate's power, too. Professional opinion, after all, can go both ways, and there's little doubt many members of Knesset, not to mention a large swath of Israelis, would welcome the chance to have their say about the manner in which the rabbinate operates.

Opposition to the rabbinate's strictly Orthodox position has been mounting for years now. Israelis increasingly are demanding a more open and pluralistic religious leadership, one that embraces all Jewish denominations and adopts a modern approach to the key areas controlled by the rabbinate. And in recent weeks, those opposed to the rabbinate – and, more generally, the institutional control of Orthodoxy in Israel – appear to be making some headway.

Earlier this month, Israel's attorney general, Yehuda Weinstein, cancelled fines levied against two restaurants in Jerusalem that had labelled themselves kosher even though they did not carry kashrut certification issued by the rabbinate. For the time being, restaurants that use non-rabbinate certification will not be allowed to advertise themselves as "kosher," but Weinstein's ruling opens up the possibility for new discussions about what the word should mean in Israel and potentially weakens the rabbinate's power.

Religious and political leaders must work together in Israel – Rabbi Lau is correct about that. But it's a two-way street. If the rabbinate wants to have its opinions heard on a larger scale, it's only fair to demand that it respect the religious positions of non-Orthodox Israelis, too. ■ — YONI

Israel accelerates China engagement as Asia policy takes shape

Ng Weng Hoong

As Iran's nuclear talks with the UN and Israel's campaign to stop it dominated the headlines, news of the two countries joining others to help China found a new multilateral bank largely escaped scrutiny. After the March 31 deadline, 57 countries had joined the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB) to fund proposed multi-billion-dollar projects in Asia and the Middle East.

The bank's rise barely six months after its memorandum signing has presented Israel and Iran with an unexpected opportunity for collaboration. The AIIB forms part of China's grand strategy to reshape the global economy that includes the revival of the ancient 6,500-kilometre Silk Route alongside a new maritime trade channel stretching from the South China Sea to the Persian Gulf.

"Both countries have huge motivations to join the AIIB and support China's Silk Route strategy," said Shalom Salomon Wald, a senior fellow at the Jerusalem-based Jewish People Policy Institute. While security remains their primary concern, Israel and Iran are also eyeing the area's huge infrastructure demands and opportunities to work with other countries.

Iran is so desperate to escape Western trade sanctions that it immediately accepted China's offer to join the AIIB, said Wald in a telephone interview.

In contrast, Israel's engagement with China has been in the works for at least two decades. Wald credits Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for laying the groundwork for Israel's China pivot following his first visit to Beijing in 1998. Well before taking office in 1996, Israel's youngest prime minister at 46 years old had identified China's importance to his country's future, although the "Look East" shift was briefly interrupted when he lost re-election in 1999. By then, Israel was already convinced it needed to actively engage Asia's rising powers.

According to Wald, who wrote an influential book, China and the Jewish People, in 2004, Netanyahu felt that Israel was too focused fighting intractable prejudices in Europe and the Middle East made worse by the rise of radical Islam. China, India, Japan and some of their neighbours with almost no history of anti-Semitism were in full economic bloom, and buying products and services that Israel could supply. Israel faced a simple choice: continue obsessing over the old world, or branch out to a welcoming Asia with its large fast-growing markets.

Netanyahu made his move in May 2013 with a trip to Beijing to meet the new leadership under President Xi Jinping who was envisioning a globally-involved China with a large footprint in the Middle East. That meeting culminated nearly two years of groundwork to re-position Israel for an increasingly multi-polar global order.

"In 2010 and 2011, we undertook a detailed analysis of Israel's economy and concluded that we had to expand ties with Asia. China topped our agenda," said Netanel Oded, a senior National Economic Council (NEC) member in the Prime Minister's Office. Headed by influential economist Eugene Kandel, the council also counts India and Japan in Israel's long-term plan.

In his second coming to Beijing, Netanyahu played to China's self-esteem by calling Israel "a small country" and "a perfect junior partner" in their joint quest for economic development. He clinched the relationship with an offer to his host to co-operate in Israel's technology development.

Why would anyone risk sharing technology development with a country so notorious for intellectual property (IP) violations?

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrives for a meeting with Liu Yandong, the vice-premier of the People's Republic of China, in Jerusalem in May 2014. FLASH90 PHOTO

"We discussed this issue at length," said Oded in a phone interview as the NEC wrestled with the challenge of protecting Israeli technology in courting the Chinese market.

"China craves foreign technology, and Israel is seen as a world leader in technology," explained Dan Ben-Canaan, a China-based Israeli academic. Netanyahu's offer was timely as China was seeking international expertise to help clean up its environment and reduce its economic dependence on smokestack industries.

His trip helped launch the China-Israel Joint Task Force (JTF) to develop large projects that would "integrate Israeli advanced technologies into the Chinese market."

China responded by boosting its economic commitments with Israel. Oded said Chinese firms have invested more than US$2 billion in Israel so far this year compared with $300 million in 2014. Chinese firms are vying for Israel's infrastructure projects including a 300-kilometre freight rail linking the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. The two countries will soon begin free trade agreement talks as China prepares to overtake the U.S. as Israel's largest trading partner.

As part of its strategy to safeguard Israeli IP, the JTF has invited top Chinese firms to invest in Israel and jointly develop solutions with local firms.

"It's important to build trust so that we can focus on jointly developing the technology to meet China's demands. The Chinese need to know our work style and expectations, and we have to know theirs too," said Oded.

To date, more than 30 large Chinese firms including Alibaba, Xiaomi, Baidu, Lenovo and Fosun have established subsidiaries in Israel with the goal of developing technology and boosting exports to China. In a March 30 update, Kandel predicts that growing bilateral relations between the two countries will have "far-reaching effects on the Israeli economy."

Not everyone shares Kandel's optimism. Alon Levkowitz, an East Asia analyst at the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, said "some Israeli companies are limiting co-operation with China," for fear that their IP will be compromised. He reminds Israel that the U.S. remains its main ally while China enjoys close ties with Iran and Syria.

But some Israelis are now accusing the U.S. of "abandoning" Israel with its proposed nuclear deal with Iran. Exacting some revenge, Netanyahu defied the Obama administration by committing Israel to the AIIB and supporting China's Silk Route strategy. China might yet help Israel and Iran find common ground. Or it might not, as the world awaits the next twist in this convoluted plot. ■

The true test of valour for Jewish parents

Judaism has two traditions – the tradition of the fathers and that of the mothers. What's the difference?

MAHARAT ABBY BROWN SCHEIER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The eshet chavil (woman of valour) described in the book of Proverbs is quite the woman

She doesn't sleep. She has an eye for business and buys a good field and works it. She makes clothes and linens for her home and even makes enough to sell. She feeds everyone in the house, waking up early to make sure they are properly satiated. She brings, she gives, she finds, she takes, she plants, she makes cloth and clothing – I'm exhausted just reading about her!

I read these verses and wonder: is it really possible to find an eshet chayil?

The verses of Eshet Chayil are traditionally sung to the woman of the house at the Shabbat table. However, in the very traditional home that I grew up in, this was one tradition we did not practise. My mother would have none of it.

Her opposition was not because she didn't take responsibility for the gourmet meal that was put before us. On the contrary, like the biblical eshet chayil, her hands were never idle. In fact, my strongest memory of my mother is how hard she worked in the kitchen – chopping, cooking, baking, braiding the challah. She was constantly creating.

My mother also made linens and curtains for all of our rooms (they kept changing as we grew up). She even made her own maternity clothes when she didn't like the ones in the stores. She planted and worked in the garden, and like the biblical ideal woman, she, too, had only words of kindness for everyone she encountered or spoke about.

You would think that the song was made for her, but she would have none of it

It could be that she was ahead of her time and understood that idealizing one's partner is detrimental to a relationship

Interestingly enough, the Bible doesn't present an equivalent list of characteristics of a capable husband. When we do have a description of an ish chayil, a man of valour, it describes a leader of the community. For example, when Jethro instructs Moses to choose community leaders, they are to be anshei chayil, "able men that fear God, men of truth, hating unjust gain."

> You would think that the song [Eshet Chavil] was made for her, but my mother would have none of it

From a biblical perspective, a woman of valour is one who toils with her hands, is busy taking care of the needs of others – especially in the home. A man of valour, on the other hand, is one who is honest and upright – that allows him to be a judge and a leader of others. It is his intellectual abilities that are extolled.

In A Tribute to the Rebbitzen of Talne, Rabbi Yoseph Dov Soloveitchik wrote, "People are mistaken in thinking that there is only one tradition – the community of the fathers. It is not true. We have two traditions – that of the fathers and that of the mothers…

"One learns much from the father: how to read a text – the Bible or the Talmud – how to comprehend, how to analyze, how to conceptualize, how to classify, how to infer, how to apply, etc… One also learns from a father what to do and what not to do, what is morally right and what is morally wrong… [the] father's tradition is an intellectual-moral one."

The Rav then explained the tradition of his mother: "I used to watch her arranging the house in honour of a holiday. I used to see her recite prayers; I used to watch her recite the sidrah [weekly Torah portion] every Friday night and I still remember the nostalgic tune. I learned from her very much. Most of all I learned that Judaism expresses itself not only in formal compliance with the law, but also in a living experience. She taught me that there is a flavour, a scent and warmth to mitzvot.

"I learned from her the most important thing in life – to feel the presence of the Almighty and the gentle pressure of His hand resting upon my frail shoulders. Without her teachings, which quite often were transmitted to me in silence, I would have grown up a soulless being, dry and insensitive."

The Rav gave the example of Shabbat to understand the different roles of his parents: "The laws of Shabbat, for instance, were passed on to me by my father… The Shabbat as a living entity, as a queen, was revealed to me by my mother; The fathers knew much about the Shabbat; the mothers lived the Shabbat, experienced her presence, and perceived her beauty and splendour."

This is a beautiful tribute to the role of the woman in the spiritual household. Yet I feel uncomfortable reading it, since the implication is that what the father taught – the intellectual Torah – was lacking in soul and sensitivity.

Perhaps my own mother instinctively understood that the Torah and the traditions that she wanted to pass on to her children were not just the traditions of the home. Her hands were not only for the challah she baked, but they also expressed her passion for teaching, writing, learning, and her hands were also there to hold the phone – she was always listening and sharing.

Israel's Jewish and democratic ideals are in harmony

Gil Troy

A new front in the relentless attacks on Israel is the attack on Israel's democracy. The argument is perverse. Democracy remains MIA – missing in action – throughout the Arab world. Palestinians in Gaza suffer under a Hamas dictatorship. Palestinians in the West Bank endure an authoritarian regime with a president serving the 10th year of his four-year term.

Israeli Arabs are among the few Arabs in the Middle East who enjoy basic civil liberties and a stable democratic government, exemplified by their 63.5 per cent turnout this past Israeli election. Palestinians in the territories are among the few Arabs (with their Israeli Arab cousins) who can petition a Supreme Court that occasionally limits the government.

Nevertheless, critics magnify Israel's occasional governmental missteps so much that many now believe Israeli democracy is imperiled, using that as an another excuse to question its right to exist.

Underlying this outrageous lie is a false assumption – echoed in Israeli domestic politics – that Israel's "Jewish" and "democratic" characters are in constant conflict. While there are occasional tensions, remember that the Bible gave birth to democracy, meaning that Jewish and democratic ideals usually harmonize with each other.

Democracy begins by realizing that every individual is equal, has dignity, and has inherent rights. From that flows the need to protect civil liberties, maintain consent of the governed, and nurture a flourishing civil society.

The Bible was a revolutionary revelation because it appreciates each individual human being. The ideas of liberty and equality follow from that insight as naturally as summer follows spring. So many biblical verses celebrate the individual, the essential commitment to fairness, the mission to "proclaim liberty throughout the land."

That's the easy sell. The great revisionist Zionist Ze'ev Jabotinsky loved to teach that "Every person's a king," crediting the Bible as the source of that notion, which clearly shaped his vision of how central democracy was in Jewish tradition and should be in a future Jewish state.

There was a broad Zionist consensus regarding the overlap and interplay between Jewish and democratic values. In his speech on "The Imperatives of the Jewish Revolution," delivered in Haifa in 1944, David Ben-Gurion, across the ideological spectrum from Jabotinsky, proclaimed: "This people gave the world great and eternal moral truths and commandments. This people rose to prophetic visions of the unity of the Creator with His creation, of the dignity and infinite worth of the individual (because every man is created in the divine image), of social justice, universal peace, and love – 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'"

The harder challenge is looking at someone like Moses, clearly designated by God as leader and seeing the democratic lessons embedded in his leadership narrative. When God first dispatches Moses to lead the people out of Egypt, the young ex-prince says, "but, behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice: for they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee." This reflects the classic democratic leader's challenge of searching for legitimacy.

Similarly, in the buildup to the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai, God tells Moses that by making the revelation publicly, it will enhance his status with the people. A true dictator compels and controls, while a democratic leader invites and occasionally cajoles. Again, while Moses does not run for election, he does experience what we call in American politics the "permanent campaign," the attempt to remain popular with the people, rooted in respect for them and their collective power.

All democracies are imperfect, and all reconcile various tensions. Rather than bemoaning Israel's Jewish democracy, we should celebrate it as a miracle, that despite constant warlike conditions, it has preserved equality, liberty, consent of the governed, civil society and individual dignity, as both Jewish and democratic values. ■

The stuff of memory

Sara Horowitz

One wonderful facet of academic life is the opportunity to live temporarily in places other than one's own home. Research projects, visiting professorships and the rhythm of the university calendar make it possible to spend weeks, months or even a year in some other city or country. Professors swap homes with colleagues in distant places, settle in apartments of other nomads or rent other short-term spaces.

And there you find yourself, with some small percentage of your wardrobe, none of your usual kitchen accoutrements, little of your library, away from the decor you've painstakingly put together and few of the life souvenirs you've acquired.

You find yourself, in other words, away from your stuff.

Most of my colleagues reflect on how startlingly liberating it feels to be away from your stuff. You feel light and portable – a better version of you. "We don't need so much stuff," you find yourself thinking. You don't miss any of the things left behind. You find yourself suddenly cured of attachment to things material, vitally connected to the intangibles that matter. And as the time to return draws near, you think it will be so odd to go back to all that stuff.

But then you're home, and it's not odd at all. We reconnect to our possessions quickly and happily. Because for most of us, our stuff helps define us and anchor us to time, place and context. That we save letters, photos, our children's macaroni paintings; that we treasure challah knives and kiddush cups passed down through generations; that we collect dolls, tchatchkes, watercolours, first editions or sugar cubes – this accumulation of stuff does not mean that we are superficial or materialistic. Except for the relatively few true ascetics, we human are creatures who make meaning in padding our nests. Our things are a physical sign of the web that connects us with our past, our present, our world, our people.

I thought of the importance of stuff recently when I saw Woman in Gold, the film that traces the restitution of a famous Klimt painting to Maria Altmann, whose Austrian Jewish family had owned it before it was plundered by Nazis during World War II and made its illicit way into a museum in Vienna.

The film succeeded in dramatizing an unusual story of art recovery without allowing the story of a painting, however magnificent, to eclipse the greater, more devastating story of the Jews of Europe under Nazism. Art may sometimes be recovered, the film reminds us at several key points, but murdered victims cannot.

The painting is truly amazing. Seen in its New York gallery, it dazzles. But Altmann treasured it not because it was great art or because it was valuable, but because it was a portrait of a much-loved family member.

For most of us, the stuff we treasure doesn't add up to millions. Still, we value our family artifacts no less, and for much the same reasons: they connect us to those who came before, to those we love, to our own stories, to ourselves. But no ambitious curator would eye them with envy. They would not end up on auction at Sotheby's.

In Woman in Gold, the Klimt painting becomes something more than itself. It becomes a symbol of all that was outrageously taken from the Jews of Europe – and of the enduring absence of accountability, and the insistence on justice, or at least, truthfulness about the past. Ironically, the painting's masterliness and value made its postwar possessors fight to hold on to it and at the same time allowed its rightful owner to locate it and demonstrate its provenance.

After seeing the film, I thought about the everyday stuff taken from ordinary folk during the war. These things – family heirlooms, photos, sentimental gifts and the like – would be no less precious to their inheritors, but are impossible to locate, impossible to recover. ■

Why Canadian conservatives respected Alan Borovoy

Michael Taube

Many Canadians were saddened to hear that Alan Borovoy, former general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA), passed away on May 11. This included many Canadian conservatives, too.

Surprised? You shouldn't be.

It's true that we didn't have much in common with him when it came to politics. As Barbara Kay noted in her fine personal tribute to Borovoy in The Walrus on May 12, "he established himself as Canada's most dogged defender of classical liberal values." I agree, but that was often in spite of his own hardline political tendencies.

To wit, the CCLA's most prominent spokesperson wrote in his memoir, At the Barricades (2014), "I was a social democrat, a civil libertarian, a secular Jew, and a philosophical pragmatist." (Canada's right would have agreed with his position of being "an unequivocal anti-Communist and perhaps even a Cold War hawk.")

That being said, many Canadian conservatives and libertarians shared one important trait with this social democratic thinker: his strong support for free speech.

I would be surprised if most right-leaning Canadian free speech defenders didn't publicly or privately respect Borovoy's lifetime of work in this particular area. There were always points of disagreement, and pretty strong ones, at that. Yet it's hard not to admire the fact that he often went against the left-wing grain when it came to freedom of speech.

National Post columnist George Jonas put it this way on May 13: "[Borovoy] derived his satisfaction entirely from defending civil liberties against encroachments from the right of the political spectrum. It never occurred to him that civil liberties can be threatened from the left, or more precisely he never let it occur to him, and resisted others trying to point it out. Consequently our association consisted of little except sharp debates during endless walks in Toronto's Yorkville district that generally began in the now defunct Coffee Mill. We agreed on virtually nothing except the importance of liberty. It was enough for a lifetime of friendship."

In my view, Borovoy was the closest thing we ever had to a left-wing free speech absolutist in Canada. He was always willing to strongly defend the rights of those he personally despised (neo-Nazis, anti-Semites) to ensure that the rights of all Canadians would always be protected.

A passage from his book, The New Anti-Liberals (1999), summed up his lifelong position rather nicely: "Freedom of speech is undermined not only by the convictions that are ultimately registered, but also by the prosecutions that are initially threatened. If we cannot speak our minds publicly without the fear of facing a criminal charge, we are not enjoying a meaningful freedom of speech."

Exactly. As I've argued many times before, freedom of speech is the defense of ideas that are objective and objectionable. A truly democratic society must support views that appear right to us and must tolerate views that appear wrong to us. We don't have to agree with an opposing viewpoint, but we must defend a person's right to support a particular position in a nonviolent manner.

If you don't happen to agree with those basic principles, please don't call yourself a free speech supporter. You're not.

This doesn't mean you have to like or admire the person who made a particular comment, however.

Consider this thoughtful example from the pen (well, computer) of CJN columnist Bernie Farber. In a May 12 column for Now Magazine, he wrote about a time when his mentor appeared on an open line radio show. "One of the callers turned out to be famous Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel. Borovoy seized the moment. 'While I feel obliged to defend Mr. Zundel's legal rights, I have no comparable obligation to treat him with respect.'"

"It was quintessential Borovoy," wrote Farber. While I never had the opportunity to meet him, I'd have to agree.

Alan Borovoy, RIP. ■

Anti-Semitism should be an international crime

Alan Baker

Anti-Semitism has always been, and remains, a major, recurring aspect of life. Curiously, while the phenomenon has been universally researched, the international community has never been asked to criminalize anti-Semitism as an international crime in a similar manner to the criminalization of genocide, racism, piracy, hostage-taking, crimes against humanity, war crimes and terror.

With the plethora of material dealing with anti-Semitism, and in light of the dreadful tragedies that it has wrought on humanity for thousands of years and its recent re-awakening, one might have expected that some effort would have been made by the international community, as well as the world's Jewish organizations, to declare anti-Semitism an international crime.

This would have been appropriate as well as propitious in an international community that is increasingly becoming open to the concept of extending criminal jurisdiction in order to counter impunity, including through the establishment of ad-hoc international criminal tribunals to deal with atrocities committed in various regional conflicts (Yugoslavia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Cambodia and others) as well as the International Criminal Court, which, pursuant to its 1998 Statute, was established to address "the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole."

By its very nature, its long, bitter and never-ending history, and its propensity to constantly re-appear in modern forms and contexts, anti-Semitism cannot, and should not, by any pretext of so-called "political correctness," be equated with, linked to or treated like any other form of racial discrimination. It cannot and should not be relegated to any type of listing of forms of racial discrimination and xenophobia. Anti-Semitism stands alone.

In this context, attempts over the years within the international community, principally at the behest of Muslim countries, to attach to it Islamophobia and other phenomena in various international resolutions and declarations (including the infamous 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa), are clearly artificial and transparent, and fail to do justice to what clearly is a unique phenomenon that must be dealt with independently.

With a view to correcting what is clearly a vast international injustice, and to universally criminalize anti-Semitism within the world community, a draft "International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of anti-Semitism" has been prepared by a team, headed by this writer, within the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. It was presented to the Global Forum to Counter Antisemitism, held in Jerusalem earlier this month.

This convention has been drafted following the accepted format of other UN international conventions condemning such crimes as genocide, racial discrimination, terror and other serious international criminal phenomena. It will be presented to the international community in a series of conferences to be held at the United Nations and other international organizations and in select capitals, and it will seek the support and sponsorship of states and Jewish organizations.

The aim is to encourage select states to sponsor the draft convention and either to present it to the appropriate UN bodies for processing as an international convention or to convene an international conference or forum dedicated solely to anti-Semitism, independent of and separate from the UN, with a view to its formal adoption as a draft treaty and its submission to states for signature and ratification.

In light of the complex and legal nature of the subject matter, and the novel idea of criminalizing anti-Semitism internationally, it's anticipated that this text will be the subject of considerable discussion and debate both within the relevant bodies dealing with the issue of anti-Semitism as well as in the wider international arena where political and other issues would be injected into the discussion.

It will not be an easy task, but it is necessary. ■

Alan Baker served as Israel's ambassador to Canada as well as the legal counsel to Israel's Foreign Ministry. Today he directs the Institute for Contemporary Affairs at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

Police investigate east end newsletter for hate

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Toronto Police Service's hate crimes unit has opened an investigation into a newsletter delivered in the Beach and East York neighbourhoods of Toronto that residents say is anti-Semitic.

Police are acting on a complaint from a member of the public who received the May edition of Your Ward News in their mailbox, said Det.-Const. Kiren Bisla.

"We're looking at it to see if it violates any hate laws," Bisla told The CJN.

Complaints about the publication were first raised by a Jewish postal worker who objected to delivering the newsletter, which claims it is delivered to 48,000 homes and has 200,000 readers.

The May edition of the publication features on its cover photo-shopped images of a purportedly Jewish postal worker, with a beard, kippah and payot (sidelocks), a bagel by his side and spraying bagel crumbs from his mouth, saying "It's the Holocaust all over again." Next to that image is a pictures of two stereotypical Jewish lawyers, with long noses, seeking to determine whether a past issue of the magazine promoted hate.

Inside the magazine, you'll find references to Jews and Israel that paints them as powerful, manipulative and invariably in a negative light. There is a claim that the attack on the Charlie Hebdo offices in Paris was "a staged false-flag operation likely perpetrated by the Israeli Mossad and the American CIA (the same two groups that dragged us into wars for Israel, by destroying the Twin Towers and created the fake 'ISIS' threat.)"

Much of the material aimed at Jews was also employed by notorious anti-Semitic propagandists Jim Keegstra and Ernst Zundel: references to "ZioMarxist-controlled mainstream media;" a claim that "Marxist Jews in the Soviet Union" were responsible for killing 50 million Orthodox Christians; suggestions that the Holocaust "supposedly happened to your people;" that Jews have "an inherent supremacist attitude;" the claim that Ashkenazi Jews are really descendants of Turkish Khazars; and that Jews perpetrate massacres. A novel twist is the assertion that Jews were behind the Armenian genocide.

Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress and former head of its community relations department, said the publication "is a throwback to the times of the Heritage Front" – except the material published by the white supremacist Heritage Front was not as "in your face."

He referred to the front page of the newsletter, which was a part of a wraparound sponsored by editor-in-chief James Sears' New Constitution Party of Canada, as "ugly caricatures of Jews better left in the [Nazi-era newspaper] Der Sturmer than in a Canadian publication."

(The home page of Sears' New Constitution Party's website relies heavily on Nazi imagery, including upraised arms giving the Nazi salute.)

Farber, who noted that one of the photo-shopped caricatures on the front page was based on a picture of himself, applauded residents of the Beach who raised concerns about the newsletter's contents. And he rejected suggestions that marginal publications like Your Ward News should be left in obscurity.

The front cover of May's Your Ward News

"I always believe these people should be exposed," he said. "And if he violates the law, he should be subject to the law."

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said "the caricature that appears on the May issue is clearly anti-Semitic. Whether that is the intent of the individual is a different matter."

He noted the magazine has repeated references to "zioMarxists," a conflation of Zionism and communism.

"It's difficult to escape the conclusion that the purpose of the material is to point to the Jewish community and demonize the entire community," he said.

Warren Kinsella, a lawyer and author of Web of Hate, a look at the extremist right in Canada, said he and other residents of the east end have started a website called Canadiansagainstprejudice.com to oppose the message of the newsletter.

The site lists Your Ward News advertisers and asks if they know what kind of newsletter they are supporting.

Kinsella said he has been in touch with Canada Post, which continues to be paid to distribute the magazine, despite examining its content. "They don't seem to care at all," he said.

Canada Post did not respond to a query prior to The CJN's deadline, but the Toronto Star quoted a Canada Post spokesperson as saying that Your Ward News did not meet the standard for "non-mailable matter."

Leroy St. Germaine, publisher of Your Ward News, also did not respond to The CJN's requests for comment, but he told the Star that the publication is not anti-Semitic, that the caricatures were meant to be humorous and that the publication is simply "not politically correct."

And in a message to readers, Sears challenges those who would use the courts to "silence us. I am a fearless, obsessed man with very deep pockets who is loved and admired by many wealthy sympathizers. Canada Post, a multi-billion-dollar crown corporation, submitted to me. Attack us and my wrath will be swift, unyielding and decisive. I will crush you like a cockroach." ■

Will Challenges, Ethics and Halacha

Since 2006, B'nai Brith Canada's Estates & Trusts Group, Lawyers Division has been providing seminars to lawyers and accountants on estates and trusts issues. In each of our seminars, there is one thing that separates us from the balance of the CLE programs offered in the city. We address ethical issues in the context of estates, Ontario and Jewish law.

Charles Wagner

Under the Substitute Decisions Act, a person can appoint a person as power of attorney for property to manage property and to make personal care decisions. The legislation sets out certain duties of that person which includes an obligation to obtain a copy of the last valid will and testament of the grantor and ensure in managing the grantor's property, that specific assets bequeathed to specific parties are not liquidated if possible. Arguably, that might require a court to adjudicate on the validity of a will prior to the testator's demise.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner

We have invited Archie Rabinowitz of Dentons Canada and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner of Yeshiva University Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov of Toronto, to present a paper that compares and contrasts the obligations of a power of attorney under Ontario and Jewish law. Archie Rabinowitz is uniquely qualified in this regard not only because of his time spent in Yeshiva studying Halacha, but because he is a senior member of the estates bar. Rabbi Torczyner is the Rosh Kollel of YU Kollel in Toronto. He has been a frequent guest speaker at the seminar and holds a series of CLE lectures for lawyers throughout the year on issue that arise when Halacha and common law conflict.

Archie Rabinowitz

Archie's and the Rabbi's presentation will address how the different legal systems deal with the Power of attorney issues. May the power of attorney profit from his/her role? Is gifting assets of the grantor permitted? What restrictions exist on the discretion of the POA with respect to property and personal care? Finally – what is the ethical and professional obligation of the orthodox Jewish power of attorney and lawyer when the obligations of Ontario's law and Halacha conflict?

The event will take place on June 2nd, 2015 at Shaarei Shomayim-Synagogue at 470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5N 1V8. Registration is at 7:30am and the moot court will begin at 8:00am. The event is open to lawyers and accountants. Those lawyers and/or accountants interested in attending may contact Elyse Gruenspan at B'nai Brith Canada at (416) 633-6224 or email at egruenspan@bnaibrith.ca .

Charles B. Wagner, of Wagner Sidlofsky LLP, is a certified specialist in Estates & Trusts Law. He chairs the Estate and Trusts Group, Lawyers Division of B'nai Brith that created and runs this annual continuing legal education program for professionals dealing with estate and trust issues.

Montreal event hails Harper as a modern-day King David

jarnold@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, right, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, presents Prime Minister Stephen Harper with the inaugural King David Award.
PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE / JILL THOMPSON PHOTO

Stephen Harper defended his government's anti-terrorism legislation as necessary for protecting constitutional rights and not a threat to them, as the opposition claims.

The prime minister received thunderous applause for Bill C-51, which will soon receive royal assent, from the more than 1,000 guests attending a dinner in his honour, held under the auspices of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal (Vaad Ha'ir) on May 21.

Harper received its inaugural King David Award for his clear and consistent defence of Israel and strong moral stance against anti-Semitism.

The event, held under extremely tight security at Montreal's Crowne Plaza hotel, benefits a new fund in memory of Lynn Eltes, who died one year ago, created by her husband Sam Eltes. This year's proceeds will be directed to Jewish education "in all its forms" in Canada and abroad, it was announced.

Guest speaker World Jewish Congress president Ronald Lauder stated "unequivocally" that Israel and the Jewish people have "no better friend" than Harper.

Harper's theme was that the world is an increasingly dangerous place and Canada must do what is necessary to keep its citizens safe.

"There is a war on Canada... the threat is real," he said, citing a recent CSIS report that "there are violent groups and people in the world who want to kill Canadians."

Bill C-51 provides Canada's security agencies with the tools to keep Canadians safe, without infringing on their freedoms, he said.

He also defended Canada's participation in the battle against ISIS in Iraq and Syria, saying "it is in our national interests" and "Canada can't opt out of the world."

He also affirmed Israel's right to defend itself.

"Israel's leadership has no choice but, at all times, to take the force it needs to protect what its enemies wish to destroy," he said.

"The only difference between Hamas and Israel, and ISIS and us, is that Hamas is closer to Israel. Israel is on the front lines. Those who turn a blind eye to Israel's enemies do so in the long run at their own peril."

Harper also said: "Our foreign policy is different from the approach in the past, when we were trying to be liked by every dictator with a vote at the United Nations... We refuse to be neutral."

Harper was praised throughout the evening in the most effusive terms and received several standing ovations, even shouts and whistles.

Lauder also emphasized that the world is becoming more perilous, especially for Jews.

"I believe we are at the most dangerous point since the end of World War II," he said.

"After the war, no normal person would express anti-Semitism. But three generations later, 70 years, it's once again out in the open. And Israel is the lightning rod for this anti-Semitism."

Lauder sounded the alarm that Iran "denies the Holocaust while it plans for the next one."

The accusation from certain quarters that Israel sent a rescue mission to earthquake-stricken Nepal "to steal children is no different from the blood libels of 300 years ago," he said.

The boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign's "ultimate aim is to destroy the Jewish state."

Anti-Semitism is a daily phenomenon, particularly in Europe, he added. "When a young boy in a yarmulke can't walk safely on the streets of Paris or London or Berlin, something is terribly wrong... We've been this way before."

The situation is made all the worse because "the world is silent," with Harper being one of the few exceptions among political leaders, Lauder continued.

The evening's MC, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, said Harper's strong moral stance has special meaning for him as the son of a Holocaust survivor.

"The battle scars of anti-Semitism are not theoretical for many people in this room. You [Harper] understand this... You learned about anti-Semitism and what happened in World War II from your father, and you vowed to stand with the Jewish People." ■

Jewish values enhance life, JEDx speakers tell event

People show greatness when the stakes are high, Rabbi Rafi Lipner, executive director of The House, an organization that seeks to cultivate a deep appreciation of Jewish values and traditions in Jewish young adults, told an audience of 550 at The House's third annual JEDx event.

A variant on the popular TED talks, JEDx, which stands for Jewish Ethics Defined, was created as a platform for young Jews to be inspired by the stories of innovators who have integrated Jewish values into their personal and professional lives.

Held May 20 at St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts and primarily attended by Jewish young professionals, this year's theme was "No Compromises," and the four featured speakers discussed different ways they have stuck by their values.

In his opening remarks, Rabbi Lipner stressed that only when people have strong values is the notion of "no compromises" relevant.

Jonathan Medved, founder and CEO of the global equity crowdfunding platform OurCrowd, spoke about embracing traditional Judaism as a young adult and how it has seriously enriched his life.

"I've never looked at being Jewish as 'giving stuff up,' but as what I got from it," he said, describing how he's woven Jewish values into his work life, such as giving his employees chol hamoed off on Sukkot and Passover and establishing a kosher kitchen in his office.

He said his observance of Shabbat has given him a healthy work-life balance.

"I'll tell you this much: when Friday afternoon comes, I'm gonna be mellow. I'm going to be smelling the cooking, thinking about taking that first sip of single malt and playing with my grandkids... There's no such thing as an opposition between culture and Judaism. You can have it all."

The next speaker was Cheryl Reicin, a partner at Torys LLP and an internationally renowned lawyer specializing in life sciences and technology.

Reicin spoke about a life-altering experience she had at age 26.

Already a lawyer, she was flying back to her former home of New York from a vacation in Israel when the crew discovered a note someone had left in the washroom saying there was a bomb on the plane.

As the plane turned back, Reicin grew contemplative, reflecting on what she had done in her life so far to "move the dial."

Though she had experienced considerable career success, Reicin felt she hadn't done enough to make an impact.

When the flight landed safely and she returned home, Reicin began making changes. She got involved in legal work for Israeli biotech companies, she eventually joined a number of foundation boards, and she started a program with help from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto called Genesis, which runs a Jewish mentoring program.

"What keeps me sane is Shabbat. People ask me if it's impeded my career, but I say with 100 per cent certainty that it's enhanced it. I'd never be able to keep this pace without it."

Next up was Lynda Fishman, a social worker, inspirational speaker and author of Repairing Rainbows, a book about rebuilding her life after her mother and sisters were killed in a plane crash when she was 13.

She'd promised herself she would have a happy and fulfilling life despite this tragedy, and she described building a family, reinventing herself through several career changes – from hospital social worker to camp director to author – and inspiring others to be resilient.

The final speaker was Michael Katchen, the 27-year-old founder and CEO of WealthSimple, an "accessible" wealth management company.

He described how, in putting immense energy into figuring out his company's values, he'd briefly neglected investigating his own individual values.

He shared what he's since reflected on: that it's important to live deliberately, to surround yourself with people who will keep you honest, to hold yourself accountable and to "live up to your values even when no one's watching."

The latter principle has been informed by his Jewish values, he said, which have taught him to strive to become his ideal self. "Many of us here are just starting our careers, and this is the time to think about who we want to be and how we can get there, so we don't wake up in 20 years and go, 'This isn't who I wanted to be.'" ■

Dinner to honour community builder Aron Frankel

shupac@thecjn.ca

In addition to the three children, 13 grandchildren and 19 great-children he left behind, Aron Frankel left a strong community legacy, says his daughter, Esty Edell.

On June 1, Bnei Akiva Schools will honour the late Frankel, one of the founders of Bnei Akiva's affiliate Orthodox high schools Yeshivat Or Chaim (for boys) and Ulpanat Orot (for girls), with the Aron Frankel Legacy Dinner.

To be held at the Terrace Banquet Hall in Vaughan, the event will include the dedication of the Aron and Miriam Frankel Beit Midrash at Ulpanat Orot – a newly refurbished beit midrash funded by Edell and her husband Joseph – and will also feature a number of speakers, including Edell, who will speak on behalf of her family.

Dinner co-chair Eli Rubenstein will give a tribute to Frankel, while the keynote speaker will be Rabbi David Stav, chief rabbi of the Israeli town of Shoham and co-founder of the alternative Orthodox rabbinical organization Tzohar.

Frankel, a Holocaust survivor and an immigrant to Canada from what is now Ukraine, passed away in 2008, leaving behind his wife Miriam.

Frankel was an avid community-builder and strong proponent of modern Orthodox Jewish education.

He helped found Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Or Chaim, the boys' division of the school, in 1973, and he helped establish the girls' division, Ulpanat Orot, in 1975, both in accordance with the Bnei Akiva principles of aliyah and love of the Land and People of Israel – values to which he was steadfastly devoted, his daughter said.

Hailing from a long line of scholars, Frankel was raised in a traditional chassidic family in Galicia and was forced into hiding along with his parents when the Nazis occupied Galicia in 1941.

Though his father was killed by the Nazis, Frankel and his mother managed to survive the war. In 1948 they moved to Toronto, where he studied under Rabbi Avraham Price, embarked on an accounting career and met his wife Miriam, with whom he had three children: Mark, Ralph and Esty.

Aron and Miriam Frankel

A founding member of Clanton Park Synagogue, Frankel became heavily involved in growing the local Jewish community and fundraising for Jewish educational and other initiatives, in Toronto, across North America and in Israel.

He helped to establish Or Chaim with a vision of integrating Torah education and love of Israel with a strong secular education, Edell said.

He saw this as a way of fostering future community leaders in North America and Israel.

A year or so after helping to establish the boys' high school, Edell was of the age to begin high school, and Frankel pushed to establish a girls' version of the school, one that would also emphasize Torah and love of Am Yisrael and Eretz Yisrael, said Shaindy Cohen Goldstein, who helped organize the legacy dinner.

"I'm very proud," Edell said. "My parents came here as ravages of the Holocaust, with nothing, just an indelible spirit and a strong need to succeed and create a family steeped in Jewish values, as well as a community steeped in the values of religiosity, education and commitment to make the world a better place."

The event begins at 6 p.m. and tickets are $180 per person. ■

Na'amat Canada celebrates 90 years of volunteerism

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For Bess Plosker, volunteering has always been a part of her and her family's life. Growing up in Winnipeg, she watched her mother give back to the local community. Now living in Toronto, that spirit of giving has extended to her children and other relatives.

But Plosker, 91, has another family – a group of 80 women – that remains just as integral to her life. Plosker is one of the last surviving members of Club Masada, which this year celebrates 70 years of service to Na'amat Canada.

As members of an organization that supports and enhances the quality of life for women and children in Canada and Israel, Plosker and close to 40 other women in their late 80s and 90s are still active volunteers.

"I always felt that people need to give meaning to life, and live with a purpose," Plosker told The CJN. "We [in Club Masada] care about our work for Na'amat in Israel, but we also care about each other."

Founded in 1945, Club Masada's current efforts include a Spiritual Adopt-a-Child program to financially support children in Israeli day care centres.

For Club Masada meetings, only about 20 women are still able and healthy enough to come out. Regardless, these senior volunteers still lead the charge in fundraising for the organization.

To honour this continuous spirit of giving, the Ministry of Citizenship will recognize these senior volunteers with special awards at a May 31 gala in Toronto. The gala will also celebrate 90 years of Na'amat Canada, as well as the anniversaries of Club Masada (70 years of service) and Club Beersheba (60 years).

For many years, Na'amat volunteers in Canada were called "Pioneer Women." The Canadian contingent was formed to help contribute to Israel's growth from afar.

Na'amat began in Israel in 1925 as the Women's Organization for the Pioneer Women of Palestine. The original founders were members of the Labor Zionist movement that wanted to help build a country where women had benefits such as equal pay for equal work and access to post-secondary education.

Since its genesis 70 years ago, Toronto's Club Masada can boast having seven Toronto Council presidents and three of Na'amat Canada's national presidents. The Toronto club has also raised more money for Na'amat Canada than any other group in the organization's history.

One of those national presidents was Pearl Mekler, who served in the role from 1981 to 1984. Mekler is a founding member of Club Masada whose mother was a founding member of Na'amat Canada's first club in 1925.

"For some people, it was social and an escape," Mekler said, referring to Club Masada. "For me, it was more ideological. But I did make some lifelong friends."

Mekler recently came up with a program to honour Na'amat's founding mothers. The new initiative is aimed at Jewish women whose mothers and grandmothers were the original Na'amat volunteers in Canada, with the hope of spreading charitable goodwill to future generations.

Many years ago, those founding mothers stood on street corners handing out oranges to raise money for Palestine. Today, the hope is for younger Jewish women to remember their parents and grandparents through the spirit of giving.

Of the other programs Club Masada has championed, the Spiritual Adopt-a-Child fundraiser has been its most successful. The project has given financial support to more than 18,000 children in Israel as they move from one of Na'amat's many daycare centres through high school.

The founding members of Na'amat in 1925.

To mark 90 years of Na'amat, the gala committee hopes to raise enough money to "spiritually adopt" 90 children. A $1,000 donation will subsidize one of Na'amat's 18,000 children in daycare for a year.

Na'amat Canada has also helped to sponsor women's shelters for victims of violence and domestic abuse in Israel, as well as legal aid bureaus.

"It's part of my being… I cannot imagine life without it," Mekler said of Na'amat. "I feel fulfilled that I have contributed something to the building of the State [of Israel] and maintaining it." ■

Israel-Canada business growing on several fronts

plungen@thecjn.ca

Reza Moridi, left, and Avi Hasson

Business ties between Canada and Israel continue to expand.

Earlier this month, Reza Moridi, Ontario's minister of research and innovation, visited Israel, where he and Avi Hasson, chief scientist of Israel's Ministry of the Economy, each announced $3 million in funding for companies collaborating in joint research and development projects in the high-tech field.

Around the same time, Innovation Saskatchewan, the Embassy of Israel and the Canada-Israel Industrial R & D Foundation (CIIRDF) hosted the first-ever Saskatchewan-Israel Agritech Roundtable in Saskatoon. The event brought together representatives of 10 Israeli technology companies and leaders of more than 30 organizations in the province's agricultural sector.

Further to the west, an earlier effort to promote collaboration between Israeli high-tech companies and Canadian oilsands firms has led to 21 Israeli proposals to help Alberta oil producers deal with issues such as water reclamation and greenhouse gases.

And in yet another development, the Embassy of Israel and Startup Canada are sponsoring a competition to find Canada's top ICT (information and communications technology) startup to represent Canada in Start Tel Aviv, a global competition for founders of web or mobile startup companies in the seed stage of development. The winner, who must be between 25 and 40, will receive "an intense, all-expense-paid, five-day startup experience in Tel Aviv."

These are busy times for those promoting business ties between Canada and Israel, said Henri Rothschild, president of CIIRDF, which will implement the Ontario funding program in Canada.

Both Ontario and Israel have pledged $6 million for joint projects as part of the Ontario-Israel Collaborative Program (OICP), but that will amount to only about 40 per cent of the total invested in research. The Ontario and Israeli companies are expected to contribute or raise the rest, he said.

Each company is eligible to receive a maximum of $300,000 toward the projects, which are expected to focus on areas such as medical devices, information technology, advanced manufacturing, clean technology and the life sciences. Those are the areas that have already been funded by the two jurisdictions, based on a memorandum of understanding initiated 10 years ago.

To date, provincial and government of Israel funds have gone to support 15 joint research and development projects, leveraging nearly $17 million in investments from other sources and generating $52.5 million in revenue for the participating companies.

Rothschild said the corporate participants predict that in the next decade, up to $1 billion in economic value could be realized from the joint projects, though he suggested a figure closer to $200 million to $300 million might be more realistic.

"The new agreement will support existing collaborative research and development projects between Israel and Ontario-based companies and includes a new call for proposals for joint initiatives," the ministry said in a statement.

The CIIRDF will administer the Canadian portion of the joint project by soliciting calls for proposals, reviewing them, providing feedback and selecting the winning bids. The organization also serves as a "matchmaker," bringing together Canadian and Israeli companies eager to participate in the process. "Because we're well networked in Canada and Israel, we're suited to find matches," Rothschild said.

Moridi said Ontario "recognizes that [its] capacity to compete internationally and create the jobs of tomorrow depends on collaboration. That is why we welcome this continued partnership with Israel."

Hasson added: "The OICP is a highly effective gateway that enables the Office of the Chief Scientist to connect with ideal technology partners across Ontario and facilitate co-operative R & D that benefits both jurisdictions. This co-operation is essential to address our shared innovation and economic objectives."

In Saskatchewan, meanwhile, the gathering of Canadians and Israelis included Premier Brad Wall, Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak and key players in the province's agricultural sector, Rothschild said. Like the Ontario agreement, the Saskatchewan-Israel R & D Collaboration Program promotes joint development and commercialization of new technologies, with a focus on agriculture, clean tech, minerals, nuclear and energy.

Referring to the Ontario project, he said, "We're very excited. We know there are a lot of companies waiting for this announcement, waiting to make applications." ■

Chesed initiative aims to raise $3M in one day

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Charities from Canada, the United States and Israel are gearing up for the Millions For Chesed Giving Day on June 2, an ambitious all-or-nothing mission to collect $3 million for Jewish non-profit organizations within 24 hours.

Tobey Finkelstein, a Jewish community professional based in Baltimore and the founder and organizer of this initiative, said she was inspired to put this online crowd-funding event together following a number of successful crowd-funding runs for local organizations in Baltimore.

"I thought, I could do this [for Jewish organizations]," Finkelstein said.

"I approached the American Jewish Outreach Professionals (AJOP)... and within six weeks, we put together a giving day model and we sent it out to [a] list of different organizations. About 19 of them were able to, in this model, get some crowd-funding on the day [in February], and it worked."

In just 24 hours, the effort raised $1.36 million. But on June 2, organizers and participants are setting their sights higher with a goal of raising $3 million.

On the giving day, the 14 participating organizations' donation pages will go live, and will begin collecting donations.

There will also be a communal landing page (www.charidy.com), providing a general fund for those who don't want to donate to one specific organization, but prefer to have their donation disbursed to all the participating organizations equally.

What sets this fundraising initiative apart from many others is the all-or-nothing approach.

Finkelstein said the reason organizations aren't allowed to collect any of the donations unless they reach 100 per cent of their goal is because "it creates urgency for the donors, for the community... When there isn't a short time limit, in this genre, or even online... we forget about it."

"Something needs to break through your psyche to say, 'This is something I need to do now,'" she said.

"There is so much donor fatigue, it's annoying. My friends would hate me if all I kept doing was asking them for money... Because of the model, it's all or nothing, so it breaks through that. It's 24 hours, it's short, so I know you're not going to ask me for two months. You tell me and it's done."

Another aspect of the giving day is that every donation made is going to be quadrupled. Each participating organization is required to line up three of their major donors to leverage the community gifts that come in that day.

Tobey Finkelstein

> There is so much donor fatigue, it's annoying.

For example, if an organization has pledged to raise $100,000, they must bring $25,000 from the general community, while each of the three major donors will contribute $25,000 to bring the total to $100,000.

"So that $75,000 is riding on the backs of the little guy. It helps actualize it, like, 'Wow, our small donations make a huge impact,'" Finkelstein said.

Chasdei Kaduri is the only Canadian charity taking part.

Jonathan Tebeka, a volunteer with Chasdei Kaduri, a Toronto-based organization that has been providing weekly food deliveries to needy Jewish families in the GTA since 2013, said it is gearing up for the big day.

"We're still working on getting our donors to match... and we're looking to raise $5,000 total," he said.

"I'm confident, because we get funding throughout the entire year from donors and they are very generous. If it wasn't for them, we wouldn't be able be in operation for the past two years."

He said he hopes that now that this organization is a registered charity and can give tax receipts for donations, people may be inclined to give more.

Vancouver campaign raises record $8 million

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

The Vancouver Jewish community punches well above its weight, said Ezra Shanken, the CEO of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver after the federation announced it had raised a record $8 million in its 2014 annual campaign.

The total, which is $290,000 more than was raised in the 2013 campaign, will go toward supporting programs and services within Vancouver's Jewish community and several Jewish communities and causes abroad.

Federation attributes a key part of this year's campaign success to the revival of a match fund that it hadn't used for several years, which saw gifts from first-time donors and those increasing a donation matched dollar for dollar by several major donors.

Shanken, who has held the position of federation CEO for just a year, noted that the $150,000 that was raised using this system "really drove the campaign and helped us to get to $8 million."

Most of the full amount raised – 65 per cent – will go to the 35 local agencies the federation supports and address causes such as Jewish education and assisting vulnerable Jews in the community.

The rest will go overseas to help organizations such as the Jewish Agency for Israel and to bolster partnerships the federation is engaged in in northern Israel.

Campaign chair Harvey Dales said in a statement that he was "amazed and inspired by this community and the support received from thousands of donors and hundreds of volunteers."

He stressed that 93 per cent of the total was raised by volunteer canvassers who contacted and met with members of the community.

Shanken said 250 volunteers went out and met with anywhere from three to 10 individual donors each to talk to them about needs within the community.

"It's really quite remarkable to see how many volunteers go out year after year to have these incredible conversations with people," he said.

Vancouver is the third-largest Jewish community in Canada and the westernmost major Jewish hub, with about 30,000 Jews.

"In many ways, we take on the individual personality of being the Jewish centre of western Canada, but we also have a connection to other Pacific northwest Jewish communities like Seattle and Portland," Shanken said. "Seattle has twice as many Jews as we do, but our campaign is much stronger than what we're seeing south of the border. The infrastructure we have on the ground here is quite extraordinary for a community of 30,000."

He said it's been a strong year generally for the federation, which raised $250,000 for Israel during last summer's Operation Protective Edge and additional funds for special projects undertaken both locally and globally, such as an initiative to help Jews in Ukraine.

"It's been a real banner year for our Jewish community," Shanken said.

He emphasized that Vancouver is a particularly unique and dedicated Jewish community. "It's a very special place. If the physical beauty isn't enough for you, the warmth of the community is incredible. You can see how warm and generous they are by how they've stretched themselves to reach this record campaign," he said. ■

Concordia to host international Israel studies conference

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca MONTREAL

Concordia University, still associated in the public's mind as a hotbed for anti-Israel expression, will host 300 academics from many parts of the world devoted to the scholarly study of Israel in all its facets.

The 31st annual meeting of Association for Israel Studies (AIS) takes place at Concordia's downtown campus from June 1 to 3, when these academics will present papers on topics related to the modern state of Israel, or its pre-state years, in disciplines ranging from political science and sociology to literature and the arts.

It's "a huge feather in the cap" for the Azrieli Institute of Israel Studies, founded just four years ago at Concordia with a $5-million donation from the Azrieli Foundation, and its director Csaba Nikolenyi. It's only the second time the AIS meeting has been held in Canada.

The symbolism of such a conference taking place at Concordia can also not be ignored, he agreed.

The meetings alternate each year between Israel and abroad.

While the largest number will come from the United States and Israel, Nikolenyi said the academics are also from China, Russia, Japan, Egypt and Europe, including Hungary, the Czech Republic and Romania.

Nikolenyi, also chair of the program committee, chose as a theme, Sustainable Israel: A Changing Society in the 21st Century, to reflect the strong interest in ecology and development at Concordia. The university, for example, was recently selected as the executive secretariat of Future Earth, a UN project. That, of course, does not mean that participants had to present on that theme and, in fact, the great majority will not.

There is a mini-plenary on Sustainability in Israel featuring three Israeli academics from the Sustainability Research Centre of the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies.

The field of Israel studies has been steadily growing, and in the past decade, has expanded considerably, said Nikolenyi, a political scientist.

The AIS now has members in dozens of countries on five continents. Its current president is Hebrew University's political scientist Prof. Menachem Hofnung.

Among the prominent personalities taking part in the AIS meeting will be Anita Shapira, author of a new biography Ben Gurion: Father of Modern Israel (Yale University Press) and a Tel Aviv University professor emeritus, and Ilan Troen of Brandeis University, founder of the journal Israel Studies and considered one of the leaders in the field.

Jennifer Solomon, co-ordinator of the 31st Association for Israel Studies annual meeting, is joined by program assistants Marat Grebennikov, left, and Nate Dagane.

Of course, one need not be Jewish to be an Israel studies academic, and, in fact, there are Arab and Muslim participants. For instance, Menna Abu Khadra speaks on "Israel Studies at Egyptian Universities: Cairo University as a Test Case."

One of the Azrieli Institute's research fellows, Yakub Halabi, is on the meeting's local organizing committee.

Members of First Nations will be participating in sessions on sustainability.

The more than 75 working sessions scheduled cover such topics as Israel's relations with the United States, Palestinian rights, the status of Jerusalem, the settlements, the legal system, Holocaust research, security policy, gender equality, and Zionism today.

The effect of the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign will also be discussed. Last fall, Concordia undergraduates endorsed a BDS resolution.

The Azrieli Institute is a multidisciplinary research centre that fosters and supports graduate studies, as well as faculty research projects. Post-doctoral fellowships worth $24,000 are available, as well as support for visiting faculty fellows.

The institute created the first and only Israel studies undergraduate program in Canada, enabling students to take a minor in the subject.

Besides the working sessions, there are related events such as the screening of Israeli films, and exhibits, like the one on sustainable architecture and design by Technion students and another on the National Library of Israel's digital archives project.

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler will give the keynote address "Israel, Human Rights, Global Anti-Semitism" on June 2, when Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak will also speak. The meeting is open to the public. ■

After 75 years, Sol and Frances Levin are still in love

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Having been married for 75 years come June 6, it's a question Frances and Sol Levin can't seem to escape.

Asked to share their wisdom about what makes a successful, decades-long marriage, Frances, who turns 95 in August, said it's hard to pinpoint.

"Well, you have to love each other first. You have to be kind to each other," she said.

But for Sol, 98, his answer was simple.

"I'm still in love with her."

Both Frances and Sol were born and raised in Montreal, where they raised four children and have since been blessed with a growing family of 13 grandchildren and 25 great-grandchildren. The couple spoke to The CJN about the ups and downs of their 75 years together.

Sitting in the library of the Dunfield Retirement Residence in midtown Toronto, where the Levins moved last year, they recalled the day they met in 1938.

"We met at a dance," Sol began.

"He was my best girlfriend's boyfriend and she told me about what an adorable guy she was going out with. And then we went to this dance," Frances said.

"He called me the next day and I said, 'I can't go out with you'... but he was persistent. But he wasn't the one for me, because I had a boyfriend."

Sol said he was taken with his future wife the moment he laid eyes on her.

"After I saw her, that was it. It was love at first sight, actually," he said, and he left his girlfriend at the time to pursue Frances.

"I wasn't attracted to him in the first place. He was too much for me. First of all, I was 18, and he was three years older. I never went out with anyone who was more than a year older," Frances said.

Frances, who had been living with her aunt since her mother died when she was just two years old, needed to be convinced.

"I wasn't sure about him, and my aunt used to say, 'He's so good.' And I would say, 'I don't know.' It took me about six months before I realized that he was the one."

Sol, who made a living as a businessman, said there was no formal marriage proposal.

"I don't think I popped the question. It was just assumed."

About two years after they met, when Frances was just two months shy of her 20th birthday, she married him at Montreal's Shaare Zion Congregation.

The Levins welcomed their first child in 1944, and within 3-1/2 years, they had three kids. They raised their family in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (NDG), a residential neighbourhood in Montreal's west end.

Sol and Frances Levin

Frances said although they had a happy marriage, she did experience some difficult times. "You go through all kinds of feelings... There was a time when I was ready to leave him."

"Now you're telling me?" Sol interjected, barely rattled by this confession.

Frances said she was visiting her doctor, who was also a family friend, and she told him, "'I can't do it. It's too hard.' And he said, 'Tell me what would happen if he got into an accident and was hurt? I said, 'I'd want to die.' He said, 'There you are.'"

When asked what the biggest challenge in their marriage was, Sol said, "I didn't think we had any."

"You know what, he never had any, and it's still the same," Frances said.

"Everything is fine. Everything is great. Nothing bothers him. We're certainly opposites. No question."

Susan Levin, the couple's youngest child, said she grew up with a wonderful family life and parents who set a great example of what a happy marriage should be.

"Until last year, when my father couldn't do it anymore, he got her a card and flowers for every birthday and anniversary," Susan said. "And my father never left the house in the morning without kissing my mother goodbye. Never."

She said her parents also played together.

"They played bridge together, they golfed together, they went away during the winters," she said, adding that they're both still mobile and active, playing bridge in their spare time and keeping current by reading newspapers and books.

"But we weren't tied to each other. I could do whatever I wanted, go wherever I wanted. He didn't care. And he could, too," Frances said.

When asked to describe the kind of a wife Frances was, Sol said, "What kind? The best. She is the best of everything. You're the best of everything, darling," he said, turning to face her, reaching for her hand.

On June 6, they'll celebrate at the Dunfield with some 60 family members and friends. ■

Judaism must include both intellect and emotion

That true test of valour, then, is to have a Judaism that includes both our intellectual selves and our emotional selves. We create this through action. We also create our Judaism through the meaningful texts that can enrich us – in our classrooms, at the dinner table or in any conversation.

The traditions of our fathers – the Halachah and the rituals – must not be dry and insensitive. We need to breathe spirit and beauty into it. We need to be a part of it. And the traditions of our mothers, which are experiences of the home, must also be intellectual and moral.

> The traditions of our fathers must not be dry and insensitive.

It has been 21 years since my mother, Francine Ruth, or Tzipora Rut, passed away. Those hands that wrote volumes, taught so many and provided both physically and spiritually for others, were put to rest. On her tombstone, my father chose the following verse from the book of Ruth to be inscribed: "Ki yodea kol shaar ami ki eshet chayil at" – the people at the gate know that you are a woman of valour. ■

Sloane Feldberg, 12, chairs annual Crohn's and colitis walk

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Twelve-year-old Sloane Feldberg is the honorary chair of this year's Toronto Gutsy Walk, which raises money for a cause that's been part of her life since day one.

Sloane was diagnosed with ulcerative colitis at age eight, but she was already quite familiar with the condition.

"There was blood in my stool, and I had a very sore stomach all the time. Ulcerative colitis was already in my family, as my mom [Raquel] was diagnosed the year I was born. I've had CT scans, MRIs, and have been put to sleep to have colonoscopies at the hospital," she said.

"Every day, I take medication to help control my disease. Without taking my medication, I would be sick – I really need it," she added.

"The Gutsy Walk brought a lot of meaning to me and my family, and allowed my mom and me to really bond and focus on our disease in a positive way by fundraising and bringing awareness to our friends, family and my classmates."

On June 7, Canadians in more than 60 communities across the country will join together for Crohn's and Colitis Canada's 20th annual Gutsy Walk. The five-kilometre Toronto event will start at 10:30 a.m. at Sunnybrook Park.

The mother-daughter duo is part of a team called This Bag Ain't Prada.

"Our logo is three people holding hands. Two have Prada bags and one has an ostomy bag to be a symbol of support," explained Sloane, who designed the logo.

"My mom was wearing an ostomy bag and it was definitely not like a Prada bag, but her ileostomy actually saved her life," she said.

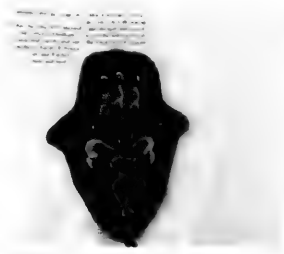
Diagnosed in 2002, Raquel Feldberg, 47, has spent more than 2-1/2 years of her life in and out of the hospital.

"I have had complications and multiple surgeries, which landed me in Mount Sinai Hospital for a total of approximately nine months between September, 2011 and May 2013. My colon was friable, full of infection and necrotic [dead] – it needed to come out immediately," said Raquel.

Raquel's diagnosis began a painful 11-year journey that she describes as a time of confusion, fear and frustration.

"I had four more major surgeries plus other painful procedures: full-time IV medication therapy, internal abscess and leak, internal/external drainage catheter through my backside for four months, major hair loss, severe muscle atrophy, painful skin infections and horrifying relentless



Raquel Feldberg used a handmade hamsa hand cover and prayer for good health that belonged to her late grandmother, and she would hold it to her heart before surgeries.

pyoderma gangrenosom splitting open my skin across my abdomen," she said.

After her final surgery in 2013 and while recovering in hospital, Raquel started a fundraising campaign and assembled a team from her hospital bed. Some 5-1/2 weeks later, she walked her first Gutsy Walk and was named Crohn's and Colitis Canada's top fundraiser in Toronto, and one of the Top 10 in Canada.

Crohn's and ulcerative colitis are diseases that inflame the lining of the gastrointestinal tract and disrupt the body's ability to digest food, absorb nutrition and eliminate waste.

Inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) describes a group of conditions. The two main forms are Crohn's and ulcerative colitis. People with IBD have one disease or the other, but not both.

"Since its inception, Gutsy Walk has raised $29 million. The Gutsy Walk is often a first contact point for people with Crohn's and colitis. It becomes quite a hopeful community event because people meet others who are living and succeeding with the disease," said C.K. DesGrosseilliers, marketing and communications manager for Crohn's and Colitis Canada.

One in every 150 Canadians is living with Crohn's or colitis, a rate that's among the highest worldwide. The number of new cases of Crohn's disease in Canadian children has almost doubled since 1995.

"To be able to share my story and the journey our family is taking with this disease is so important. We will continue to fight for the cure," Raquel said. ■

Disagreeing with Israel is necessary to defend it, Obama says

JTA
WASHINGTON

Open disagreement with Israel on some of its policies is a necessary component of the U.S. defence of Israel in the international community, U.S. President Barack Obama told the Atlantic last week.

In an interview with Jeffrey Goldberg posted May 21 on the magazine's website, Obama singled out Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's election day appeal in March to his followers to vote because Arab-Israeli voters were turning out in "hordes."

Obama strongly criticized the appeal, and Netanyahu later apologized to Arab-Israeli leaders.

"When something like that happens, that has foreign-policy consequences, and precisely because we're so close to Israel, for us to simply stand there and say nothing would have meant that this office, the Oval Office, lost credibility when it came to speaking out on these issues," Obama said.

"And when I am then required to come to Israel's defence internationally, when there is anti-Semitism out there, when there is anti-Israeli policy that is based not on the particulars of the Palestinian cause but [is] based simply on hostility, I have to make sure that I am entirely credible in speaking out against those things, and that requires me then to also be honest with friends about how I view these issues."

Obama has come under fire from pro-Israel groups and a number of Democrats and Republicans since 2009, when he told Jewish leaders early in his presidency that he was ending the policy of his predecessors, George W. Bush and Bill Clinton, of not airing disagreements with Israel in public. His critics say open disagreements undercut the alliance and make Israel more vulnerable.

The president in his interview said his differences with Netanyahu were often overblown.

"What we said publicly was fairly spare and mild, and then would be built up – it seemed like an article a day, partly because when you get in arguments with friends, it's a lot more newsworthy than arguments with enemies," he said.

Obama said he remained strongly committed to Israel, likening its defence to the struggle for civil rights.

"There's a direct line between supporting the right of the Jewish people to have a homeland and to feel safe and free of discrimination and persecution, and the right of African-Americans to vote and have equal protection under the law," Obama said.

> It is true to Israel's traditions and its values... that it has to care about Palestinian kids.

"These things are indivisible in my mind. But what is also true, by extension, is that I have to show that same kind of regard to other peoples. And I think it is true to Israel's traditions and its values – its founding principles – that it has to care about those Palestinian kids."

Obama also said there was no inconsistency between his pronouncements saying the Iranian regime was anti-Semitic and his quest for a nuclear deal with the same regime.

"I think it is not at all contradictory to say that there are deep strains of anti-Semitism in the core regime, but that they also are interested in maintaining power, having some semblance of legitimacy inside their own country, which requires that they get themselves out of what is a deep economic rut that we've put them in, and on that basis they are then willing and prepared potentially to strike an agreement on their nuclear program," he said. ■

Will Vatican's Palestine reference impact Jewish-Catholic ties?

RON KAMPEAS
JTA, WASHINGTON

When considering the Vatican's creep toward recognition of Palestinian statehood, think "Israel-Vatican" and not "Jewish-Catholic," say Jewish officials involved in dialogue with the church.

A May 13 announcement on an agreement regarding the functioning of the church in areas under Palestinian control raised eyebrows in its reference to the "State of Palestine."

The upset was compounded by confusion over whether Pope Francis, in a meeting later with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, praised him as an "angel of peace" or urged him to attain that vaunted status. On May 19, a Vatican spokesman said it was "very clear" that the pope was "encouraging a commitment to peace."

But the Vatican's shift from terming its Palestinian partner as the Palestine Liberation Organization – the designation Israel accepts – to calling it Palestine comports with a shift in Europe toward accommodating Palestinian statehood aspirations, the Jewish officials said.

Referring to a State of Palestine was "disturbing, but not critical," Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, said in an interview with JTA.

Catholic-Jewish relations and diplomacy between Israel and the Vatican are "on different tracks," Foxman said.

Israeli officials, speaking anonymously, said they were "disappointed" in the use of "State of Palestine."

"Such a development does not further the peace process and distances the Palestinian leadership from returning to direct bilateral negotiations. Israel will study the agreement and consider its next step," an official told the French news agency AFP.

OPINION

The joys and perils of Israel-bashing

Gerald Steinberg

In the fashionable demonization of everything Israeli, one of the more amusing (and depressing) aspects is the eagerness to embrace and repeat attacks on the morality of the Israel Defence Forces, no matter how thin or absurd.

Recently, a number of self-proclaimed human rights organizations, along with friendly journalists, including the usual suspects in Canada, celebrated a 240-page document of anonymous testimonies produced by a fringe group calling itself "Breaking the Silence." Based on the instant publicity and their texts, it appears that the reporters simply copied from the press release, giving prominence to these tales.

However, for anyone who actually took the time to read and consider the claims, and had some knowledge of combat in a densely populated area such as Gaza, most of the allegations in the screaming headlines are not reflected in the details. Each fighter who fought in Gaza was aware of the dangers in an area where terrorists mingle with civilians, launch deadly missiles from houses and hospitals, kidnap soldiers or their shattered bodies, and where grandmothers become suicide bombers.

In this environment, far from committing terrible crimes, the soldiers whose "testimonies" supposedly expose terrible war crimes actually show both the fear and the admirable caution exercised by the IDF. As reported by one of the few journalists who actually read the document, "nowhere in the entire report are there rapes, massacres, or anything similar, or a single incident in which a civilian is shot in circumstances that could not be defended."

The "testimonies" are not provided as is, but edited in an awkward manner that includes the introduction of basic factual errors, reflecting the extreme political objectives behind the entire project. The anonymity of the soldiers, without any detail that would allow independent verification, adds to questions regarding the credibility of their (edited) stories. For example, as journalist Matti Friedman notes, the case of the soldier who claims to have fired at a bicyclist should not be taken at face value – "not because I doubt a teenage soldier's capacity for thoughtless cruelty, but because it's unlikely that a tank gunner could fire multiple shells and machine-gun bursts at easy targets and miss every time, as he claims."

Conspicuously missing from these reports is any hint of terrorism. The 4,563 rockets and mortar shells that were fired from Gaza toward Israel in July and August 2014 are simply erased from the record, as are the terror tunnels that went under borders and next to the kibbutz houses and dining halls of the families near the border. In this criminally immoral inversion, the leaders of Breaking the Silence erase Hamas, the Islamic Jihad and the other groups whose goals are to kill Jews and end the existence of Israel.

The dirty political war is facilitated by money (approximately $1 million US per year) from the New Israel Fund and a number European governments and church groups, who are told that it's for promoting human rights.

In addition to press conferences and a media blitz, the funds pay for extensive globetrotting. In the past two years, the leaders of Breaking the Silence have enjoyed more than 30 trips from Israel to different locations in Europe, North America, Australia and South Africa. Once there, in addition to being wined and dined, they repeat the tales that defame and libel Israeli soldiers, and turn the universal principles of human rights into cheap propaganda. In this way, they feed the growing market for Israel-bashing.

In response to the latest wave of false allegations, hundreds of soldiers have posted their own "testimonies," which stand in sharp contrast to those sold by Breaking the Silence. They do not have money from foreign donors to organize press conferences or go on world tours, but, as in the war against Hamas terror, their determination to succeed will make the difference. ■

Recognition of PA 'a minor event' professor says

Marshall Breger, a professor at the Catholic University of America's School of Law who has led a number of Jewish dialogues with other faiths, said the use of the term Palestine was the product of an evolution in how the international community is treating the Palestinian question.

"De facto, the Vatican has accepted Palestine as a state," he said. "It just adds one more country to the over 130 that have recognized Palestine."

The issue is a matter of diplomacy and does not breach the sensitive issues under discussion between Jews and Catholics as they mark the 50th anniversary of the Nostra Aetate, the declaration that absolved Jews of responsibility for Jesus' death, Breger said.

"It's a minor event," he said. "It should not interfere with Jewish-Catholic relations."

Using Nostra Aetate as a basis, Jewish and Catholic officials over the years have addressed problematic references to Jews in the Catholic liturgy and the role of the Vatican during the Nazi period.

Morton Klein, the president of the Zionist Organization of America, told the Washington Post that the "Palestine" reference amounted to "appeasement of radical Muslims" and signaled "the historical Catholic enmity towards Jews."

For the most part, however, Jewish organizations dealing with the Vatican were concerned about the statement, but only insofar as it represented another success in efforts by the Palestinians to secure statehood recognition outside the context of negotiations with Israel.

"We are fully cognizant of the Pope's goodwill and desire to be a voice for peaceful co-existence, which is best served, we believe, by encouraging a resumption of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, rather than unilateral gestures outside the framework of the negotiating table," David Harris, the American Jewish Committee director, said in a statement.

Weighing in with similar statements were the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the Union for Reform Judaism.

When the Vatican launched talks with the Palestinians in 2000, it referred to the other side as the PLO, but over time shifted to Palestine. Pope Francis in his 2014 visit to Israel and the West Bank spoke of "my presence today in Palestine" during a Bethlehem stop and referred to "the good relations existing between the Holy See and the State of Palestine."

Pope Francis in Israel in May, 2014

Daniel Mariaschin, the director of B'nai Brith International, said the recognition of Palestine raised concerns, but they must be seen in the context of an increased willingness in Europe to recognize Palestinian statehood and not of Jewish-Catholic relations.

He likened it to the French and British parliaments' recent non-binding recognitions of Palestine and Sweden's decision to recognize Palestinian statehood.

"It's important, I won't dismiss it, but it shouldn't be seen outside that broader context," Mariaschin said. "It raises the expectations of Palestinians to unmeetable levels and frustrates the Israelis who say we can't get a fair deal in the international community."

Obama administration officials continue to maintain that recognizing Palestine outside the context of peace talks is counterproductive. However, prompted in part by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's seeming election eve retreat from supporting a two-state solution, they now will not count out withholding the U.S. veto should the U.N. Security Council consider a Palestinian statehood resolution.

Seymour Reich, a former chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, who also has been involved in Jewish-Catholic dialogue, said the Palestine recognition should serve as a "wake-up call" for Israel.

"It doesn't affect [Vatican] relations with Israel at all," Reich said.

Instead, he argued, Vatican recognition of Palestine is another manifestation of European disaffection with Netanyahu's hawkish policies and the expansion of settlements.

"It just puts more pressure on the Israeli government," Reich said. ■

Netanyahu suspends controversial plan to segregate bus riders

JTA
JERUSALEM

A controversial program to prevent Palestinian workers from riding on Israeli public transportation in the West Bank was suspended a day after it was launched.

On May 13, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Moshe Yaalon suspended the program, which restricted workers going to work to four West Bank checkpoints and required them to return home by the same crossings. The workers would then take Palestinian bus services the rest of the way home. The plan added hours to their daily commutes.

Palestinian workers are not allowed to stay overnight in Israel. They are allowed to exit and enter the West Bank through a variety of checkpoints using a magnetic card.

Yaalon announced the program in October. At that time, Israel's Civil Administration in the West Bank said it would explore other options to provide the Palestinian workers with appropriate transportation. It had been scheduled to be reviewed after three months.

Opponents had called the plan racist.

"The only reason to have separate Jewish and Palestinian buses is pure racism," Meretz party head Zahava Gal-on said in a Facebook status posted May 13. "The separation is just a symptom of 48 years of occupation, requiring us to be blind to the Palestinians so that we can live with ourselves."

Zionist Union party head Isaac Herzog called the separation on public transportation "unnecessary degradation" and said it "pours more fuel on the fire of hatred of Israel in the world."

Israeli President Reuven Rivlin welcomed the suspension of the program.

"It is important we remember that our sovereignty obligates us to prove our ability to live side by side," he said in a statement, speaking of Jews and Arabs.

Jewish residents of the West Bank and their local governments have waged a vociferous campaign over the last few years to prevent Palestinians who work in Israel to use Israeli public transportation there. Among the reasons given for keeping the Palestinians off Israeli buses is lack of room for Jewish West Bank residents and Jewish female passengers saying they have been harassed by the Palestinian labourers. ■

Toronto-born guitarist Alex Goodman was the first Canadian to take the top prize in the Socar jazz electric-guitar competition and win the public choice award at last year's Montreux Jazz Festival in Switzerland.

No stranger to awards, Goodman has also won, among others, the 2013 ASCAP Herb Alpert Jazz Composer Award and he was a finalist for the ASCAP Morton Gould Classical Composer prize last year.

Goodman, 27, said that awards bring "some legitimacy to what you're doing" and help musicians get work in markets outside of where they live, as programmers pay attention to them. With the boost that the awards have given him, Goodman is in a position to plan a Canadian and European tour.

Currently living in New York, Goodman played regularly in Toronto's jazz clubs up until 2-1/2 years ago. He's returning to the city with his trio, including drummer Ari Hoenig and bassist Rick Rosato, for a two-night stand at The Rex on June 18 and 19, as part of this year's TD Toronto Jazz Festival.

Goodman spent five years playing and composing in Toronto while studying music at the University of Toronto. He said he learned a lot from being part of the city's vibrant jazz scene. "The core of what I do is influenced by my time there."

But Goodman wasn't always sure that he wanted a career as a professional musician. After high school, he studied political science and music at Montreal's McGill University. At the end of second year, he realized that he would need to focus on one of the disciplines. "I wasn't able to balance both," he said.

After deciding to go with music, he returned to Toronto because he was offered opportunities to play in the city. "That's where I started to get serious" about music, he added.

Goodman said he enjoys the improvisational aspect of playing jazz. "I like the ability to improvise and create music in the moment and interact with musicians around you and create something fresh."

> I like the ability to improvise and create music in the moment

He added that what he appreciates about the jazz community is that "it has opened up not only to jazz traditions but other influences."

Goodman listens to "music both within and outside the jazz world," he said. He has an affinity for classical music as a performer and a composer, and he has "dabbled in classical guitar but never really got it to a professional level."

A prolific composer, he has some 140 original works and arrangements listed on his website. Some of his arrangements are classically sourced. "I've studied the canon of classical music to learn from the great masters," he said. "I also just really love the music."

Goodman has also arranged the music of George Gershwin and Radiohead. And he knows how to swing, which you can hear on his Juno-nominated third recording, Bridges. Goodman recorded his fifth album in three nights at Toronto's Jazz Bistro early in May.

The new as yet unnamed recording includes arrangements of works by Bartok, Mendelssohn, Scott Joplin and Harold Arlen, as well as some of Goodman's originals. ■

Plays written decades apart revived at Kensington Market

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The artistic director of Toronto's award-winning Theatre Asylum, Jennifer H. Capraru, is directing FORNES x 2, which features two plays, written nearly two decades apart, by "the greatest least-acknowledged female playwright of our time."

"Maria Irene Forné is kind of from the off-off-Broadway movement of the 1960s. She came up at the same time as playwrights like Edward Albee, and Sam Shepard, people like that," Capraru said, adding that Fornés has won a number of Obie Awards, (off-Broadway awards), and was also nominated for the Pulitzer Prize.

"She wrote the first play, The Successful Life of 3, in 1965 and the second play, Mud, was written about 20 years later. So I decided to link them, using the same three actors in both plays because both plays are about a kind of love triangle."

Montreal-born Capraru, who has been working as a theatre director for more than 15 years, said she wanted to link the two plays by the Cuban-American playwright to expose a cycle of consumerism and poverty, which relates to the gentrification of Toronto's Kensington Market, where Capraru has lived for the past 20 years.

"The first play is hilarious. It's completely absurd, non-realistic. It's like a vaudeville cartoon, it's crazy and there's the music and the costumes, the lighting – everything about it is super wacky," Capraru said. "It draws on vaudeville, it draws on the Marx Brothers and that kind of comedy. It's slapstick, like old Jewish comedies," said Capraru, who is no stranger to directing Jewish-themed plays, such as My Mother's Courage.

"We see these three characters who are kind of unconscious, not really awake, they don't really take responsibility for their lives, they just have fun. The characters are called He, She and 3. So they don't even have names."

She said Mud – played by the same three-person cast made up by award-winning veteran actor Hardee T. Lineham, actor and filmmaker Michelle Latimer, and actor Jamie Robinson – is more about the need to escape.

"It's about people living in poverty, people trying to better themselves and not being able to, being limited by poverty, being limited by disenfranchisement, being limited by a lack of education. And the two plays really relate to Kensington Market where I live," she said.

"The first play is kind of about how the market is being gentrified by conspicuous consumerism. The second play is more about how the market began – as a place for immigrants to come through, especially our community, the Jewish community. They are the ones who created the market."

Capraru, who is an activist with Friends of Kensington Market, a non-profit organization that recently fought off a plan to bring a Walmart into the neighbourhood, said there are currently three Jewish families who own a number of buildings in the area that are helping to stave off the gentrification of Kensington Market.

Capraru said the production will make references to the market "in the visual style of the two plays" and the play itself will be held deep in the heart of the market, at Augusta Avenue and Baldwin Street in an underground space with 10-foot ceilings.

FORNES x 2 examines consumerism, poverty and relationships, and human rights issues in general, which is the focus of much of Capraru's work.

"I used to direct a lot of Jewish contemporary plays that are really asking who we are, focusing a lens on our humanity. And that is what these plays do as well," she said.

In July, Capraru will be presenting a play about Osip Mandelshtam, one of the foremost Russian poets of the 20th century.

The play will be presented at the Anshei Minsk Synagogue in Toronto as part of the Toronto Fringe Festival. ■

Clowning around in a satirical look at office culture

DAVID SILVERBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Forget birthday clowns and Stephen King's Pennywise. For 10 years, a new clowning duo has left Canadian audiences laughing with their improv-spiced zany shows.

Welcome to the wacky and entertaining world of Heather Marie Annis and Amy Lee, who play the sister clowns Morro and Jasp respectively. In their sixth show, they are once again trying to navigate life challenges as if they're two adolescents wearing suits for the first time. Morro and Jasp: 9 to 5, a satirical look at office culture, runs at the Factory Theatre until May 31.

In a story plunking the hapless sisters in a new company where they're pressured to come up with a "high-quality product" before investors arrive, Lee's Jasp gets stern as the self-appointed CEO while Annis' Morro remains clueless about her role. The conflicting personalities dish up, once again, a delightful mix of sharp one-liners, Pochinko-style clowning and heart-warming endings, something audiences have come to expect from Morro and Jasp shows.

"In the end, success to us is when audiences respond to the show and that they get the story," Lee, 31, says in an interview at a downtown bar. "It's important for us to speak honestly."

After all, Lee admits Jasp is an exaggeration of her own personality: like Jasp, Lee appreciates tidiness and order. Scheduling is important. But Lee says Jasp is more controlling than she ever would want to be.

Now celebrating 10 years as Jasp, Lee has enjoyed a cross-country route to her full-time job as a performer in Toronto. She grew up in Winnipeg and attended the Manitoba Theatre for Young People, before taking theatre at York University. There she met Annis and they hit it off immediately, playing Morro and Jasp for kids' audiences at first.

"But we soon realized we had to do adult shows to be fulfilled as artists," Lee recalls. They dove deep into the Toronto Fringe Festival scene, and quickly became fan favourites. Their shows each develop a theme to carry the sisters through varied adventures, such as reprising the roles from Of Mice and Men to camping in the wilderness to baking dessert. The duo even came out with their own cookbook soon after Go Bake Yourself debuted.

What Lee always appreciates about her

Amy Lee

Morro and Jasp shows is sprinkling the night with improv. "It makes sense for clowns to get the audience involved compared to other theatre actors," she says. For 9 to 5, audience members might be called up to play office staff or business advisers, and everyone has to be take part in a group activity by the show's end.

"We love those unexpected moments. It keeps us on our toes," Lee adds.

Lee has immersed herself in the theatre community in Toronto, where she also works with Young People's Theatre and is assistant-director of other productions. Theatre is family, and Lee learned how strong community can be growing up in a Jewish home with parents active in synagogue life. "I've seen how Jewish people stress community, and I try to bring that to my theatre work," Lee says.

If you miss 9 to 5 this time around, rest assured you'll be seeing those red noses many times this year. Lee says they're remounting Morro and Jasp Do Puberty at the Toronto Fringe Festival, with their first show July 1 at the Tarragon Theatre Mainspace.

Plus, a video game app starring the clowns is in the works. This choose-your-own-adventure-style role-playing game could be the first gaming app based on a Canadian theatre clown production.

And if that isn't busy enough for Lee and her team, a TV pitch will be making the rounds soon, with the hope of snagging a TV deal for a Morro and Jasp series.

For now, see Lee and Annis while they're still underground darlings of Canada's theatre scene. At the very least, you'll see the roots of a hilarious family tree destined for greatness. ■

Theatre Company's co-director acts out in Driving Miss Daisy

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's co-artistic director David Eisner will don his actor's hat in the company's latest presentation, the Pulitzer Prize winning drama, Driving Miss Daisy by Alfred Uhry. Driving Miss Daisy takes place in the Deep South in 1948,and focuses on the relationship between Daisy Werthan, the rich, sharp-tongued Jewish widow, and Hoke Coleburn, Daisy's soft-spoken black driver.

"It is about a relationship that struggles with the racism that is in the background of the history of the times," Eisner says.

Eisner plays Daisy's son Boolie Werthan who has to insist his mother gets a driver because she is 72 years old and had an accident backing out of the driveway.

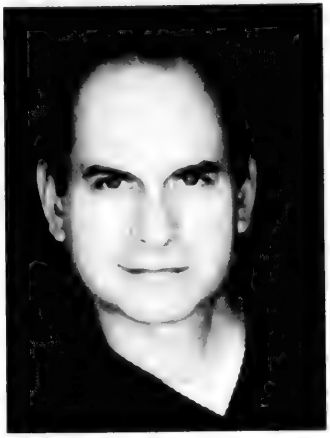
" The relationship of the driver and Miss Daisy grows from a frictional one to one of appreciation and love and for seeing each other for who they are," he says.

HGJTC decided to do this play as there is a Jewish element in it, as the Werthan family is Jewish. "It is a story about 'us and them' in my mind," explains Eisner. "I think it is a good reminder that racism is this self-inflicted toxic thing. The play is beautifully written and based on the grandmother of the writer Alfred Uhry. It has a lovely message and we are thrilled to be able to offer it to our audiences."

He says even though audiences may have seen the movie or a production of the play, he feels director Philip Akin has his own imprint and a production that people will see with fresh eyes. Eisner says he is excited to have this production in front of an audience.

Eisner can relate in part to his character, since his own mother, Janet, is 81. Eisner says his mother is a terrific lady who is with it and involved in many different things, although he does admit to using their relationship in developing his characterization.

Putting his co-artistic director's hat back on, Eisner says that he and fellow artistic director of HGJTC, Avery Saltzman are thrilled to be in their new space at The Greenwin Theatre. Subscription sales going into their ninth season are doing well and Eisner is so grateful to the Toronto Jewish audience and the audience in general for supporting the company, and they are working very hard to offer interesting productions.



David Eisner

Eisner has devoted three decades to working in the entertainment industry including 100 television, film and theatre credits. One of his first roles was as the neighbourhood hooligan Guido Lefkowitz in the iconic CBC series King of Kensington. Many television viewers will remember him from the CBC teen series Hanging In. Other series appearances were the American Highway to Heaven, and Cagney and Lacey and the Canadian shows Street Legal, Due South, The Eleventh Hour and Blue Murder.

In 2004, he received critical acclaim for his starring role in the biopic TV movie Choice: The Henry Morgentaler Story, playing the controversial abortion doctor. As well as acting in over 600 episodes of Rumours and Boarders on CBC Radio, David has directed and produced over a dozen radio plays for the station. David most recently performed in HGJTC's stage productions of Lost in Yonkers and New Jerusalem ■

This production runs from May 30 to June 21 in The Greenwin Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Joining Eisner on stage are Gemini Award nominee, Sharry as Daisy Werthan and Dora Award winner Sterling Jarvis as Hoke Coleburn For tickets to Driving Miss Daisy, call 1-855-985-2787 or online at www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Book debates issue of organ transplants

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After the first human heart transplants in the 1960s, the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (1895-1986), the leading authority on Halachah in the United States, ruled that transplants constituted "double murder": first, of the donor, whose heart was still functioning, and next, of the recipient, who invariably died shortly after the first experimental transplants.

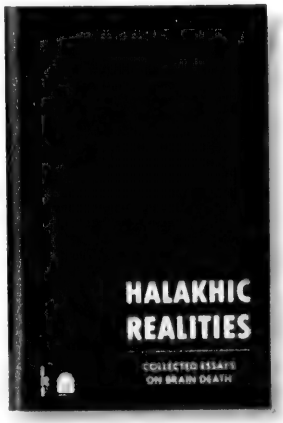
Later, transplant efficacy improved, and Rabbi Feinstein amended his position, claiming that transplants constituted murder only of the donor. As reported by reliable witnesses (but still disputed by some,) late in his life Rabbi Feinstein came around to supporting transplants as permissible according to Halachah.

This crucial change was primarily a result of the wide acceptance of "brain death" as a legitimate criterion for determining who is and is not alive. If we wait for a person's heart and lungs to cease functioning (the traditional way of determining death), the organs become unusable for most transplants. But if people are legally and halachically dead when their brain function ceases, even though their cardio-pulmonary function continues to be maintained by a machine, transplants are possible and legitimate.

This changes the Jewish religious view of organ transplants: if they are permissible, perhaps they are halachically obligatory or at least exceedingly meritorious. If we can save the life of another human being by donating an organ from our body, an organ that is no longer keeping us alive, shouldn't we do so?

The establishment "centrist Orthodox" rabbinic organization, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), has had a vacillating position on brain death. Decades ago, the RCA executive declared that brain dead patients are dead. But five years ago, the RCA published a long position paper (www.rabbis.org) that, while refraining from taking a definitive stand, unmistakably leaned toward rejecting brain death as a halachically acceptable way to distinguish life and death.

Now the newly established unabashedly modern Orthodox (or "open Orthodox") rabbinic organization, the International Rabbinic Fellowship (IRF), has joined the fray, publishing a collection of 22 essays entitled Halakhic Realities: Collected Essays on Brain Death, edited by Rabbi Dr. Zev Farber. (Full disclosure: I am a member of both the RCA and the IRF.) The essays, written by rabbis, ethicists and physicians, have some overlap, but surprisingly they manage to approach the issue from new and different angles. Most, but not all of the essays, support and encourage transplants.



Halakhic Realities: Collected Essays on Brain Death
edited by Zev Farber
Maggid Books International Rabbinic Fellowship

The variety of tone in the book is striking. For example, Rabbi Yitz Greenberg, sounding like the prophets of old, chastises those who say that a brain dead patient is not really dead:

"In the name of fealty to tradition, a tradition based on very limited and primitive science is upheld against a procedure that has saved thousands of lives. In the name of the sanctity of life, an act of lifesaving is labelled murder."

Contrast this with the dispassionate words of the philosopher-bioethicist, Jeremy Rosenbaum Simon: "Neither side has the clearly 'right' answers to these questions."

The internal differences in the book extend beyond tone. A highly respected Israeli rabbi who supports doing transplants, Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun, writes:

"Many people mistakenly believe that organ donation is the process of removing organs from the body of a dying person in the last moments of his or her life – God forbid! – an action that would be forbidden both halachically as well as medically and legally. The truth is quite the contrary. The entire medical establishment in our days agrees – and this rule is in force – that organs may be harvested only after the donor is deceased."

Since Rabbi Bin-Nun is convinced that brain dead patients are unambiguously dead, medically and halachically, he sees organ donation as permitted and even as an important mitzvah.

Yet, some of the essays by physicians raise questions about Rabbi Bin-Nun's certainty. The most gripping one is by Dr. Howard Doyle, a physician who performs transplants, treats transplant recipients, and also treats "the type of patient likely to become their donor."

Doyle supports transplants, but is candid about the medical and ethical ambiguities involved. While no one who was correctly diagnosed as "brain dead" has ever recovered to live a meaningful life, by most people's definition, Doyle describes many cases where patients were declared brain dead, but subsequently doctors reversed that determination, realizing that their brains were still functioning. Apparently, different jurisdictions have different rules about who determines brain death and how. In some U.S. states, "a physician isn't necessary . . and most require no specialized training." Even when the diagnosis of brain death is accurate, Doyle admits that such people are still alive in some sense of the word.

He concludes: "I do not believe that patients who meet the accepted criteria for brain death are dead – biologically, metaphysically, ontologically, and socially dead." But he continues, "I also do not believe a death so absolute is necessary for vital organ donation to be ethical. The donor need only be beyond harm. Or, stated differently, he should be dead enough." In the volume's summary essay, Rabbi Farber tries to justify Jewishly what it means to see an organ donor as not fully dead and still support transplants.

This first volume of essays published by the IRF sets a high standard. In general, it advocates for the mitzvah of organ donation. But in the best liberal tradition, it leaves room for different and even mutually exclusive viewpoints. This book will not end the halachic debate on brain death but it should move it to a higher level. ■

Versatile date pairs well with a variety of foods

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dates pair well with other fruits, meats, and poultry. They are also excellent combined with vegetables, grains and in baked goods.

Medjool dates are considered the "best of the best" variety of dates you can get and while they are a bit harder to find, their amazing taste and flavour are certainly worth the extra effort and cost. It's best to store your dates in a tightly sealed container in a dark, cool pantry. They can also be refrigerated or frozen.

Couscous With Dates

- ❑ 1/3 cup water
- ❑ 2 tsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. orange zest
- ❑ 1/8 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 cup couscous
- ❑ 1 tbsp. finely chopped dried pitted dates
- ❑ 2 sliced green onions

In a saucepan combine the water, oil, zest, and salt and bring the mixture to a boil. Add in couscous and dates, mix to combine. Cover and remove the pan from the heat. Let set, covered, 5 minutes. Remove the lid, fluff the mixture with a fork and add in the green onions. Serve immediately. Serves 2. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

Date Nut Bread

- ❑ 3/4 cup chopped pitted dates
- ❑ 1 cup cake flour
- ❑ 1 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ pinch of nutmeg
- ❑ 3/4 cup oil
- ❑ 1/2 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup honey
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 1 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 1/2 cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 325. Grease a 9-in. loaf pan and set it aside. Place the dates into a bowl and cover them with very hot water. Let the dates soak for 15 minutes. In a bowl, sift together the cake flour, baking powder, cinnamon, salt, and nutmeg. In another bowl, whisk together the oil, brown sugar, honey, eggs, and vanilla.

Combine the egg mixture with the flour mixture and mix to combine. Drain and pat dry the dates. Add the pecans and dates to the batter. Pour the batter into the prepared loaf pan. Bake for about 1 hour, or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cool on a rack until room temperature and then remove the bread from the pan. Makes 1 loaf. ■

CHW Healthcare
CANADIAN HADASSAH-WIZO (CHW)
NATIONAL OFFICE OPENS ITS DOORS IN TORONTO
Dear CHW Members and Friends,
We are pleased to announce our National Office has relocated to Toronto after 60 years in the beautiful city of Montreal, Quebec.
CHW recognizes that over 50% of the Canadian Jewish population resides in the Greater Toronto Area. Our strategy foresees closer proximity to many of our CHW stakeholders, members, and friends. By increasing our presence in the largest Jewish community in Canada, we are looking forward to building strong relationships and effective partnerships.
We look forward to connecting with you.

Exhibit examines the difference between Ukrainian and Jewish memory

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

A Talmud Torah school in Dubno, in western Ukraine, 1912. One of the photos included in the UJE's exhibit courtesy of the Museum of the Petersburg Jewish Historical-Ethnographic Society. It was taken by Solomon Yudovin, a photographer who participated in the 1912-14 ethnographic expeditions led by S. An-Sky throughout the Jewish Pale of Settlement.

For Jews and non-Jewish Ukrainians, divergent narratives have arisen around some of Ukraine's historical events.

A Journey through the Ukrainian-Jewish Encounter. From Antiquity to 1914, is a traveling exhibition developed by the Ukrainian Jewish Encounter (UJE), a private, multinational initiative. Slated to visit four Canadian cities between late May and September, it seeks to give greater context to and showcase varying perspectives on important historical incidents that have shaped the Ukrainian-Jewish relationship.

The exhibit, which launches in Toronto May 28 at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, Lebovic Campus, explores 2,000 years of Jewish presence on Ukrainian lands.

Through maps, books, photographs, posters and videos, it chronicles the parallel existences, struggles and transformations, as well as the cultural intermingling, of non-Jewish Ukrainians and Ukrainian Jews up to 1914.

The exhibit will run until June 7 at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre and will move to Winnipeg's Oseredok Ukrainian Cultural Centre for two weeks before returning to Toronto July 7 to 19 to be shown at St. Vladimir's Institute.

It will visit Edmonton and Montreal in September.

"One of the UJE's main goals is to create a shared historical narrative," said Alti Rodal, UJE's co-director and exhibit curator. "The two peoples have created separate narratives about the events of the past – particularly in times of crisis or violence – and one of our main goals is to have top scholars from Israel, North America and Ukraine come together and deal with issues about which there are different points of view... and reach an agreement, where possible, using evidence-based historical facts."

The UJE has already hosted a series of roundtable discussions on some of these topics with scholars of varying backgrounds, Rodal, a former professor of Jewish history at Concordia University, said.

The records of discussion that have emerged from these talks are in the process of being turned into a tangible "shared narrative," the content of which has helped inform the exhibit.

One controversial event the exhibit highlights is the Chmielnicki (Khmelnytsky) Massacre of 1648-9, when Ukrainian Cossacks, led by Bogdan Chmielnicki, rose up against Polish rule and massacred tens of thousands of Ukraine's Jews, who were known – and resented for – collecting duties and taxes on behalf of Polish landlords and bankers.

"For Ukrainians, Chmielnicki is a hero; from the Jewish perspective, he's a villain," explained Rodal. "Today, neither side looks at the other side, they just see their own perspective. Today in Ukraine, Chmielnicki is on a bank note and there's a major statue of him in Kiev. For Jews who visit Ukraine and see his image everywhere, they're taken aback."

The "difference in Ukrainian versus Jewish memory," as well as scholarly input on the subject, will be given prominence, Rodal said.

The exhibit is divided into four parts: the first features life in the territory that is today's Ukraine from antiquity to the partitioning of Poland in 1772; the second focuses on the chassidic movement, which originated on Ukrainian lands; and the final two examine the experiences of the then stateless Ukrainians and Jews in the Russian Empire and under Austrian Habsburg rule, respectively.

Several of the videos shown are the UJE's original creations, Rodal said, and deal with subjects like sites where Ukrainians and Jews encountered one another – like marketplaces, inns and taverns – and the everyday work of Jewish artisans in a range of crafts.

The UJE was launched in 2008 as a collaborative project between Ukrainians of Jewish and Christian – or other – heritages, and operates in Ukraine, Israel and various diasporas.

Funded and chaired by Ukrainian Canadian Jewish businessman James Temerty, the UJE works to promote stronger relations and understanding between the two peoples by engaging scholars, civic leaders, artists, governments and the public.

Three years ago, the UJE got some funding from the Canadian government to undertake several projects, including launching a website, creating a book of articles and developing the exhibit in question.

Rodal said the UJE made a point of showing the exhibit at major Jewish and Ukrainian centres in Canada.

Edmonton, for example, has a small Jewish community, she noted, but "a huge Ukrainian community." ■

Exhibit hours at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre are Sunday, Wednesday and Thursday, 10 a.m.-8 p.m.; Monday and Tuesday, 1 p.m.-8 p.m. and Friday, 10 a.m.-4 p.m.
The exhibit is free.

WRY BREAD

Jews, rest easy. GOLEM is here

David Levine

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Harper's government continues to take bold action against anti-Semitism and hatred of all kind. Despite the controversy surrounding recent threats by government lawyers to have organizers of BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) campaigns prosecuted for hate speech, Canada's federal government has unveiled a broad new technological initiative designed to better enforce hate speech laws nationwide.

In a surprise move, it announced the formation of the new Government Office of Legally Enforced Mentalities (or GOLEM), a pre-crime program that utilizes the latest predictive technologies to target and eliminate anti-Semitic and anti-Israel speech before it occurs.

How does it work? If GOLEM's algorithm were to detect an upcoming hate crime – say, a terrorist plot, or a freshman gathering signatures for a divestment campaign – GOLEM would automatically send the name and location of the criminal to the nearest law enforcement officer, notify GOLEM's new judicial algorithm of the parameters for sentencing and contact an Uber driver to take the accused straight to prison.

As explained by Harper spokesman Richard K. Philip, "pre-criminal detection technology is based on a revolutionary algorithm that uses metadata, social media and the Matrix to target only those subjects whom we know are guilty, or will be guilty in the near future."

And how can they know that a crime will be committed? "Because of the algorithm," repeats Philip. "It's revolutionary."

Like the threatened BDS prosecutions, the GOLEM initiative will be authorized under the recently passed "Anti-Terror Act," Bill C-51 – and GOLEM's early success has silenced critics who called it "sweeping, dangerously vague and likely ineffective," or wondered about the wisdom of changing the Criminal Code to allow police to make "preventative arrests." (I can only assume that this explains their silence. We haven't been able to contact any critics of GOLEM since the day the program began.)

"Violence against Jews is illegal," says Philip, "and now, so is attempting, planning, threatening, considering or imagining it. We feel very confident we'll be able to prosecute these opinions underground to fester where they belong. And the real beauty of it lies in the old adage that once something has been outlawed, it never manages to gain any sort of allure or traction – especially within a student population."

GOLEM's trial project has been a huge success, uncovering many more subversive, terrorist and un-Canadian plots than ever imagined. Officials have confirmed that a major terror plot was disrupted (though details remain confidential), alongside 29 loose plans to deface synagogues, 953 offensive opinions expressed about the State of Israel and one 17-year-old student's plan – following an argument about reality television – to punch classmate Sharon Jacobson in the face.

Philip is quick to explain that GOLEM isn't just about arresting people: "We've managed to prevent the incarceration of several students who were just days from learning about a BDS campaign. By arresting their professor, those students have safely avoided the topic!"

While the technology behind this program promises hundreds of applications such as forecasting the weather or preventing murder – Philip confirms that Bill C-51 restricts the use of GOLEM "strictly to anti-Semitic and anti-Israel hate/thought crimes. The secret language in the secret part of the bill could not be clearer."

Philip highlighted the Harper government's strong relationship with Canada's Jewish population as the inspiration for the program: "We believe in small, effective government that looks after the people [and that goes double for you people [Jews]. Think of us as the older brother you always needed. We have your back."

And so, like its namesake, the GOLEM program is poised to stand watch over Canada and its Jews for years to come, tirelessly monitoring our phone calls, wireless networks and banking information, detecting every single encroachment on our civil liberties until the day when there are no more to be found. ■

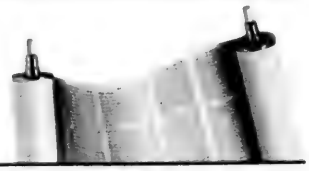
Naso | Numbers 4:21-7:89



Rabbi Aaron Katchen celebrates the Friday night tradition of blessing our children
Rabbi Michal Shekel considers the lessons we can all learn from the work of the Levites
Rabbi Howard Morrison counts the various meanings and interpretations of the word Naso

Aaron Katchen

"May the Lord bless you and watch over you. May the Lord cause His countenance to shine to you and favour you. May the Lord raise His countenance toward you and grant you peace."

"They shall bestow My Name upon the children of Israel, so that I will bless them."(Numbers 6:24-27)

My favourite time of the week is Friday night, after bringing in Shabbat. I dance with my children as we sing Shalom Aleichem, and in the moments before I make Kiddush, I give each of my children their blessing. The text of the blessing is Numbers 6:24-26 (above), an instruction by God to the kohanim (priests), to bless the Jewish People with these words.

In Israel and in many eastern traditions, the kohanim say these verses daily. In my Ashkenazi Diaspora world, we only hear them publicly on certain festivals. Otherwise, we are limited to a "remembrance" of them in our service, or we share them privately between parent and child on Shabbat.

But what does it mean to bless someone, whether it's the kohanim blessing the Jewish People or a parent blessing their children? As with most things in life, there is a simple answer and a complex answer.

The simple answer is that speech has power. Our words impact others, both positively and negatively.

The complex answer is that we are transforming ourselves into conduits to bring down God's blessings. The last verse invokes this very idea, that the source of all blessings is from God.

However, God is not a pull toy, where you pull a string and the doll talks – you say the blessing, and God answers.

As with every healthy relationship, we don't always get what we ask for. Rather, God gave us language to engage each other, bless each other and, to quote the verse, "grant peace." ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen is associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Michal Shekel

Naso provides us with details about moving days in the wilderness and God's very own moving company, the Levites. Different clans had specific tasks: the Gershonites were responsible for the various coverings related to the Tabernacle and Tent of Meeting; the Merarites handled planks, poles, ropes and pegs; and the Kohathites were in charge of the sanctuary items.

In Bamidbar Chapter 7, the tribal chieftains bring offerings to dedicate the Tabernacle, including carts and oxen to pull the carts. These become the property of the Levites and are used as ancient moving vans, except that not all the movers got to use the vans: "But to the Kohathites he did not give any; since theirs was the service of the [most] sacred objects, their porterage was by shoulder." (Numbers 7:9) It seems that the most sacred items couldn't be trusted to moving vans and had to be carried manually. For the Kohathites, carrying the sacred objects on their shoulders is literally the burden of holiness.

The Kotzker Rebbe taught that in fulfilling this assignment, the Kohathites had to be fully committed to the task: "A person does not acquire even the smallest spark of holiness without effort." Rabbi Morris Adler also saw the Kohathites as role models going beyond matters of portage: "When it comes to the very heart of religion, we must not try to find – and cannot really find – a substitute for our own shoulders. We cannot transfer to anybody else, or to anything else, the obligations that rest exclusively upon ourselves."

Naso means "to raise." In modern life, we often seek spiritual elevation on paths that hold the promise of great joy and personal happiness. How interesting, then, that what we often approach as being the most burdensome can surprise us by being truly spiritually uplifting. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ontario.

Howard Morrison

The title of this week's parshah is Naso. This Biblical word has many meanings in the Torah and Jewish literature. In Exodus 34:7, the root of Naso means "to forgive," based on God's 13 merciful attributes. We can imitate God by learning to offset our own personal feelings of hatred and seek to be forgiving.

The word "Naso" also means "to lift up." On festive holy days, Jews of priestly descent lead a liturgical ritual called nesiat kapayim, literally, the lifting of the hands. The priestly blessing is introduced by the words: "Praised are you Lord our God ruler of the universe who has sanctified us with His commandments and has commanded us to bless His people Israel with love." Lifting up the hand in our tradition expresses love. We can offset feelings of hatred with deeds of loving kindness.

Naso also means "to count." The fourth book of the Torah, called Numbers in English, begins with a series of countings. God counts the people of Israel as a whole, then again in smaller, more discrete units. When you love things, you count them over and over – stamps, coins, baseball cards, etc. You count them as a whole, and you count them again and again.

Do contemporary Diaspora Jews wish to be visually counted as Jews? Have we responded to God's call by accepting the challenges and responsibilities of being Jewish? When Israel faces hatred, will we pledge to support Israel by visiting and/or contributing in a meaningful way? Will we stand up to be counted?

Naso is the root of nissuin, the traditional term for Jewish marriage. During nissuin, the seven marriage blessings are recited under the chupah, concluding with the words: "May there be heard in the streets of Jerusalem, the voice of joy and gladness, the voice of groom and the voice of bride."

If you want to replace the atmosphere of hatred with something positive, beautiful and inspiring, take the word Naso with you. Express feelings of forgiveness, love, being called upon and counted on, and celebrate the joys of Jewish family life. ■

Michael Khoury: Israeli Arab promotes trade in Canada

plungen@thecjn.ca

Michael Khoury is Israel's trade consul to Canada. He hails from the predominately Arab city of Shfar'am, in Israeli's north, near Haifa. He is in the second year of a four-year posting in Toronto. He came with his wife, who works in the consular section, and three children attending local schools. He spoke to The CJN earlier this month.

Can you tell me a little about your background?
I am the consul for economic affairs of the State of Israel here in Canada. Our main job is to try to promote Israeli exports and help Israeli companies do business here in Canada, and to try to attract Israeli investors to Canada.

I joined the Ministry of the Economy in 2000 and before that I worked for Bank Hapoalim, the biggest bank in Israel, as a financial consultant. I decided to change careers because I believe exports and trade is the future and it is very important.

Where have you been posted before?
Canada is my second posting. My first was in Athens. I was sent there in 2003 for four years, and it was very interesting, due to the fact the Olympic Games occurred in 2004.

We succeeded to get eight Israeli companies involved in Olympic projects, with total sales or exports for the companies of around $30 million. They were involved in homeland security and telecom companies – cameras and surveillance systems.

What was the reputation of Canada in Israel as a posting for people like yourself?
It is a good place – good potential, good economy, nice people, bad weather. Yes, it is pretty much like the U.S. economy, but 10 times smaller.

We have two offices – one here in Toronto, the other in Montreal. I am the spokesman for the whole country. We will soon have four employees in addition to myself.

Are there big cultural differences in one country versus another when you try to promote business with Israel?
Of course. The biggest challenge here is twofold. First of all, Canadians don't look to Israel as a big enough market. The other challenge is that Israeli companies, when they consider coming to North America, mainly come to the United States. I'm trying to build a platform, or roadshow, to convince Israeli companies to consider coming for one or two days to Toronto or Montreal. I'm trying to get two or three delegations a year.

Another thing about doing business in Canada is that generally Canadians are conservative compared to the United States or Europe. It means it will take more time to do business and it will take much more effort to convince anybody in Canada to implement solutions or technology from Israel.

Michael Khoury

> I'm part of Israel, and I talk to people as an Israeli.

What are the main sectors in Canada you're trying to promote to Israeli businesses?
Now we are trying to focus on life sciences and medical devices. That's one. The other is cyber security. That can be relevant to different companies, banks being one of them. Hydro companies are another sub-sector. Any infrastructure or big companies, they need cyber solutions.

It is not physical security. It is security that has to do with information – anything to do with your computer, IT, different systems, internally and externally.

What does your office do to help Israeli companies conclude a deal?
I'm here to facilitate all companies that choose me. This office is a place where Israeli companies can get information and assistance to help them find relevant partners.

We try to initiate business delegations, together with our ministry in Israel and the Export Institute, which is affiliated with the ministry. For example, this year we decided to promote an event in Israel and succeeded in bringing representatives of seven hydro companies in different parts of Canada to a cyber tech event in Israel. We set up meetings for them with the companies and with organizations that deal with cyber issues. And now we are following up with them here.

When you talk to people about using Israeli products, companies or solutions, do you find resistance because of the political situation in Israel?
Not at all. In Canada, the government is very friendly and the people are really friendly. Companies, officials, NGOs – everybody I come in contact with – are really friendly people, and they are aware and open to consider co-operation with Israeli companies.

But doing business depends on price, on service, on quality. It depends on other things, not at all with the political situation.

You mention NGOs, but there are NGOs who advocate boycotting and withdrawing investments from Israel. Do you ever run into that?
I haven't. Even if there is something, it is very minor, and it's not relevant to companies or partners that we are trying to approach. All companies, all partners that we are trying to approach have nothing to do with this boycott thing.

Compared to what is going on with other countries around the world, it is very minimal.

And the anti-apartheid movement, you haven't felt that?
We haven't felt it, not at all. At the end of the day, we are succeeding in getting delegations from Canada to Israel.

What is the extent of the trade between Canada and Israel?
Trade is about $1 billion between the two countries – sometimes it's $1.2 billion– but it should be much more, in my eyes. It was about $1 billion last year.

So what do you think it should be?
It's been growing, but we should double that number, at least. But it needs a lot of awareness by Israeli companies of the Canadian market.

The Israeli companies are generally small and they have very limited resources. They have to choose which markets are most important. China is one of them. Germany is another one, maybe the U.S. Canada is smaller and that's maybe why Israelis don't consider Canada to be a big enough market. But it is.

You're a Christian Arab from Israel. Do you attend Jewish functions in Toronto and talk about Israel? Is it difficult because of your background?
It's not difficult, but I'm not a religious person, so I don't really care about religion. I respect myself and I respect the State of Israel. The Arabs are a minority in Israel and the Christians are a minority inside the minority. We are 20 per cent of the Arab minority.

It's very important to be part of Israel. We want to be part. We want to be part in every aspect, in representing the country abroad, and professionally and personally. I feel really part of Israel. So yes, I'm part of Israel, and I talk to people as an Israeli.

When I talk to people I make them understand that Israel is not only Jewish – 20 or 25 per cent are not Jewish.

So I'm part of this side. Maybe I'm not part of the mainstream of the Israeli society, but it is part of Israeli society, so that makes it more colourful, let's say.

I think it even makes it interesting for people to see something different, that somebody's who's not Jewish is representing the State of Israel. It surprises people in a positive way. I think it's good.

There are a few people like that, representing Israel abroad, mainly in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Do you go out to meet the Israeli Arab community in Canada?
I do. I also have relatives in Canada who left Israel in the 1970s and '80s. I'm in touch with them. They are also proud of me that I am in this position.

Do you look at local Arab Israelis as someone who could do business with Israel?
Of course. In the last five to 10 years the State of Israel, the government has tried to create tools to help Arab companies develop technology and become part of society, part of the economy. We are 20 per cent of the population, but we contribute only eight per cent of the GDP to the general economy. That's a pity. Israel loses out of a lot of money, a lot of jobs, a lot of opportunities around the world.

So, a lot of things are being done right now to have this group of people, the Arabs, join Israeli society. Especially having them work in good companies and develop their own companies. A lot of high-tech is being developed right now.

I believe in 10 to 15 years, we will see quite a good number of Arab companies.

Most of these companies are very small and startup companies. It will take some time for them to be a company with solutions that can be sold outside of Israel. But we are getting there. ■

Jewish history does not condemn the future

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN

A stunning talmudic discussion ends with the sages concluding that while it would have been better if man had not been created, one should struggle for moral perfection. This is not the kind of conclusion one would expect to find in a cornerstone religious text of Judaism. Perhaps it should not be surprising, given that the Talmud was complied in exile, after the destruction of sovereign Israel and the loss of the two Temples in Jerusalem. Nonetheless, it reflects a sad and disheartening reality.

Non-Jewish thinkers can also be pessimistic about human nature and the human condition. The German philosopher Immanuel Kant was the supreme pessimist. He is known for the declaration: "Out of the crooked timber of humanity, no straight thing was ever made."

The Bible, in Genesis, unequivocally says that God declared his creation good – except for man, whom He endowed with the choice between good and evil. Choice, it seems, is the key.

If we reflect on the state of the world, we must acknowledge the case of those who view the human condition negatively. Yet, if we ask how much pain and grief is the result of man's inhumanity to man, what would be the answer? If, miraculously, every person chose – here I reiterate the Divine gift of free will – to act humanely and compassionately, how much adversity would be reduced? There would, of course, be earthquakes and tsunamis, accidents and illness, but what percentage of human suffering would those constitute?

The talmudic sage Hillel responded to a potential convert who wanted to learn all about Judaism "while standing on one foot." He said, "What is hateful to you, do not do to your neighbour. That is the whole Torah. The rest is commentary. Now, go and study."

The Torah is teaching that the way things are needn't be the way things will be. If man is willing to learn from history, to listen to "the better angels of his nature," to act charitably, to take responsibility, the world could be a much better place.

Pagan culture saw humanity as the plaything of the gods, at the mercy of their cruel whim. Judeo-Christian civilization believes in a benevolent God desiring the betterment of his creation and generously empowering them with the ability to repair a broken world.

> The Torah is teaching that the way things are needn't be the way things will be.

The Torah teaches "If you encounter an ox of your enemy or his donkey wandering, you shall return it to him repeatedly. If you see the donkey of someone you hate crouching under his burden, would you refrain from helping him? You shall help him repeatedly." (Exodus 23:4). This is an ethics lesson of the highest order. We are commanded to treat even an enemy with honesty and integrity – and to do so repeatedly. This implies that such an act is meant to be part of a pattern of righteous behaviour, not a single magnanimous gesture. Judaism presents profound lessons in ethics and morality and leaves its implementation to the individual.

Just knowing that the world could be vastly improved and everyone's happiness could potentially be greatly enhanced if people undertook to make it so, means that it is possible. As Moses declares in his closing remarks at the very end of the Bible: God's commandment to choose life and to do good is "very near to you, in your mouth and in your heart, to perform it." Again, the choice is ours.

World history, including and especially Jewish history, does not condemn the future. Philosophers like Kant represent only their own gloom not the destiny of humankind. The biblical insistence on human choice and freewill is liberating and positive. Life has too often been almost impossible to bear, but it need not be that way. ■
